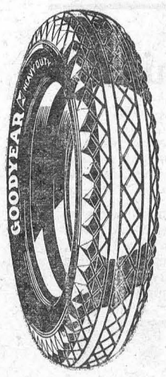
Tires that cheat the Trouble Car



PUT on Goodyear Heavy Duty Tires and you can forget the question of tires for probably as long as you'll drive your present car.

Goodyear Heavy Duty Tires are the aristocrats of tires. They're extra-strong due to their specially built Supertwist cord carcass. They're extra-tractive due to their famous All Weather Tread. At present prices these rugged hard-service tires cost but a few cents more than you were asked to pay last year for standard tires.

Drive over and let us show you why our Goodyear Heavy Duty Tires can free you from tire trouble.

It is stated that at Reno you can get a divorce in one day. Yes, but just think of the long time it takes to prepare for it.

Cheese sold on Saturday at 9 cents per pound; the lowest price for years. One year ago it sold at 16 cents, 20 years ago at 11 5-8 cents, 35 years ago between 6-7 cents.

Total number of poultry on farms at end of 1930 in the Dominion was estimated at 60,795 000, of which 56,247,000 were hens and chickens. Value of this poultry was placed at $54,852 000.

Two children. aged 10 and 14 years, playing on the street in front of their house in Montreal, were struck by an auto, and killed, one day last week This is another warning to parents to keep their children from playing on the streets.

Cornwall expects to have a curling rink next winter if present plans are carried out, and a probability of artificial ice. The wonder is that with so many Scots about Cornwall they have been so long gone without a curling rink.

The big Conservative Convention for Ontario to select a leader for the provincial party, will be held in Toronto on June 24. At the present time there is said to be several aspirants, but the present acting premier, Hon. G. S Henry, seems to be filling the position with fair satisfaction and he is a hard man to dislodge.

The Toronto Telegram, always one fo the most enthusiastic supporters of Ontario's late Premier, G. Howard Ferguson, referring to his latest utterances in London as High Commissioner, says "Since he relinquished the Ontario Premiership Mr. Ferguson has assumed the role of an irresponsible school boy and while what he says and does may keep Canada in the news columns there are those who think somebody should remind him that he is supposed to be holding down a man's job."

Largest and most powerful locomotive of its kind in the world and unique on this continent, Canadian Pacific Railway "8000" type engine, product of Canadian brains and skill and composed largely of Canadian materials, has just been turned out by the Angus Shops of the company at Montreal, for use in the railway's Rocky Mountain territory. Engine and tender weigh together 392½ tons and it has a tractive effort of 90,000 lbs., sufficient to pull a mile-long freight train of 150 forty-ton trucks, weighing 6,000 tons, on a level track.

A total of 75 fatalities occurred as a result of automobile accidents in Ontario during the first three months of 1931, according to an official statement issued yesterday by the Provincial Department of Highways. There were 973 persons injured in a total of 1 253 accidents. Of the accidents, 67 are listed as "fatal," 776 caused personal injuries, and 410 inflicted property damage. Thirty-five of the total accidents were due to collisions with pedestrians; five to collisions with other cars; 10 to collision with trains. Others were due to collisions with bicycles, fixed objects and in one case with a street car. Non-collision accidents amounted to eight.

There is something that motorists, who do much or little driving on either roads or highways, should know and likewise should remember. And that is that the driver of a car is financially responsible should an accident occur to anyone driving with him. The point was strikingly demonsrrated in a case tried in Hamilton recently, where a woman sued the driver of a car in which she had met with an accident, and was awarded $2,000 damages. That was bad enough, but to add insult to injury, so to speak the husband of the woman also sued and was awarded some seven thousand dollars by the court as compensation for the loss of his wife's labor while she was recuperating from her accident. The fact that the owner of the car had been stopped by the woman, and been asked to be driven to her intended destination, made no difference in the eyes of the law, and he was assessed accordingly. It seems a queer law, but it is a law, and motorists would be wise to keep it in the back of their minds the next time one is tempted to stop and offer a friendly lift to either stranger or friend or to accede to the request of any one who might ask to be accomodated.

Hurled off Bridge

A very sad accident occurred at Casselman on Thursday last when Mrs. Gration aged 47 years, was caught on the C. N. R. railroad bridge across the Nation River at that point and hurled into the river below. She, with another woman started to cross the bridge and had gone about a third of the way across when they heard the express train coming. They started to run back. Her sister, Mrs. Charboneau and little son were with her. The two latter stumbled and fell beside the rails, but Mrs. Gration ran on without seeing their fall. She was struck just before she reached safety. The sister and her little boy escaped injury by laying flat.

Plant Black Walnut

Through the effort of Mr. George Challies, M. L. A. for Dundas, this county may in years to come be known as the Black Walnut County. As an experiment Mr. Challies has secured from the Ontario Foresty Branch about 2000 Black Walnut saplings, and they are to be distributed throughout the County through the local Horticultural Societies. Mrs. Armstrong, Sec'y of the Winchester Society will be pleased to receive and see that all requests for saplings are filled. The cost is about a cent for each, to cover transportation. These saplings are about 18 inches high, and may be temporally planted until one has found the more suitable place for planting permanently. Black Walnut is a valuable wood, and a young farmer who owns land could not possibly make a better investment for old age than to plant several hundred of these saplings which in 25 years may be worth many dollars. If any are thinking of planting on a large scale they should communicate directly with Mr. Challies.

The Sunbeam Mission Band of St. Paul's Presbyterian Church will hold a. sale of Home Cooking and Candy and serve afternoon tea in the Sunday School Rooms on Saturday, May 16th, from 3 to 6

The May meeting of the Mizpah Mission Circle was held on Thursday last, Miss Mable Suffel presiding.

After the devotional exercises had been conducted by Miss Evelyn Fennell, the fifth chapter of the study book was received by Mabel Waddell. She told of the influences of the West on Japanese thought and in a survey of the Christian Mission Schools showed the wonderful contribution these had made especially to the girls and women of Japan. A brief report of the Presbyterial held at Merrickville was given by Mrs. Ault. The kind invitation to a picnic at her camp on June 3rd, given by Mrs. Ault was gladly accepted It was decided to make this the occasion for the semi-annual mite box opening.

At the close of the meeting refreshments were served by Mrs. Crawford and her committee who had charge of the days program.

The following, taken from the Cornwall paper of Saturday last, tells of present conditions under the Liquor Control Act.

"Charged with supplying liquor to two girls, both of whom were under 16 years of age, Leonard Sunday and Albert Gatien, both of Cornwall, were sentenced to jail terms when they appeared in Police Court this week.

Sunday came before Magistrate J. C. Milligan Thursday morning and pleaded not guilty to the charge. Provincial police, who prosecuted the case, introduced evidence to show that Sunday had given liquor to the girls. The latter were also called to corroborate this evidence and told a sordid tale in connection with it. Magistrate Milligan found Sunday guilty and sentenced him to six months in jail on the charge. He was also sent down for two months, to run consecutively, for being intoxicated in a public place. Magistrate Milligan imposed an extra 15 days in each case, if the court costs are not paid.

Albert Gatien came before the magistrate on a charge of supplying liquor to minors in connection with the same case, and was sentenced to nine months in jail."

High School Cadets Inspected

Owing to the inclemency of the weather on Thursday afternoon last, the Annual Inspection of the High School Cadets took place in the rink instead of on the school grounds and while the usual number of spectators was not present, a good many citizens were there. The cadets, led by the signalling section and drummer, marched from the school to the rink and made a good showing in the smart uniforms and appearance. They were in charge of Cadet Commander, Douglas Davidson, and Platoon Commander, Arnold Barkley and Stirling Gibson. They went through the various movements and drills, the junior platoon taking the physical exercises, finishing with a game which provoked great amusement. This was under the charge of Mr. T. J. Hawkins, M. A. The Cadets were inspected by Capt. Isbester, who addressed the boys, complimenting them on their smart appearance. Arthur Summers was chosen as the best turned out cadet on parade. The cadets were also briefly addressed by Mr. H. L Lee, Chairman of the H. S. Board, and the exercises were brought to a close by all joining in the singing of "God Save Our King."

Another Record Broken

Last week the Press stated that the heavy calf record of Cornwall had been beaten by Mr. J. S. Parker, of Kemptville. Now along comes Mr. Melvin Dawley with a calf that tipped the scales at 134 pounds on the day of birth. This latter calf was born in February last, a pure bred Holsteen and is still going strong.

The number of those receiving the old age pension is increasing, and at the present time there are over one thousand in the United Counties receiving allowances. The majority are very deserving cases and some very pitiable ones.

Boy's Narrow Escape

Young Lawrence, son of Mr. and Mrs. Sam Bilow, had a very narrow escape from being killed on Saturday last, when he was struck by a car from Morrisburg, when on the road from the Station. He was riding his bicycle behind a rig driven by his father, and suddenly darted out just as the car was passing. The driver of the car had not time to stop, and struk bicycle and boy a slanting blow, throwing them into the ditch. When picked up the lad was badly bruised and slightly cut, but no bones broken, and he will soon be all right again. It was a narrow escape.

Six Miles of Highway, No. 31, From Carleton Boundary To Be Built

Mr. Geo. C. Challies, M. L. A. for Dundas, accompanied by Mr. Smith, Deputy Minister of Highways for the province, was in town on Friday last. Interviewed by the Press, Mr. Smith volunteered the information that the contract to build a cement road from Carleton County boundary to Wimchester Village would be let within the week, and that construction work would likely commence very shortly. He stated that owing to the very bad state of the road from Winchester north to the Carleton County boundary, it was economy to build the road this year. In fact the cost of repairing and maintaining the present road road would be very heavy, and really a waste of money. The road is to be 24 feet wide and built in the very best way. In fact, Mr. Smith said, "We want this road to be one that we may point out as a sample of good road building." The contractors are required by their contract to use all possible local labor in the construction. While the road is under construction a detour will be necessary to Vernon and points north. Mr. Smith said that with good weather and proper outfit the six miles should be built and ready to travel on in two months' time The matter of continuing the cement highway through the village will be taken up by the Council at an early date. It will be an opportunity to put St. Lawrence and Main Streets business section in a condition that means permanency, and also to lower the grade of the street so that the sidewalks will not be flooded after every rain storm. The Municipality will have to pay 25% of the cost of construction through the village from somewhere near the fairgrounds to just south of Melvin's Garage.

Boys Hand Badly Hurt

Harry, the eleven year old son of Mr. Robt. J. McCooeye, who works for Mr. Melvin Dawley on his farm just west of Winchester, had his hand badly hurt on Friday evening last. He found a dynamite cap somewhere, and lighting a match applied it to the end. There was an explosion and for a minute the lad thought he was in Kingdom Come. The result was that one hand was badly lacerated, and Dr McKendry found it necessary to amputate a part of his first finger, and the end of his thumb. The hand was also badly hurt and the boy had a narrow escape from more serious injury.

Confirmation Service

On Friday evening the Bishop of Ottawa held a Confirmation Service in St. Matthias' Church, at which seven members of the Church were confirmed. L. Lee, who carried the pastoral staff. The candidates were presented by the Rector of the parish, Rev. G. Oliver Davies, while the Ven. Archdeacon Carson, of Morrisburg, read the Scripture passages. Immediately before the Confirmation the Bishop dedicated the gift of a bishop's chair to the church, given in memory of their daughter, Emily Hogaboam, by her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sharpe. He also dedicated a gift of a Stole made to the Archdeacon by his family, and in his address referred to the beautiful custom of preserving the memory of our loved ones through a permanent memorial in God's House.

In Memoriam

In loving memory of Harry Gallaher, who died May 16th, 1929

Even death has a wonderful mission.
Though it robs us of those we love.
It lifts our hearts from our surroundings
To long for that meeting above.
No matter how heavy the burden,
Nor how great the despair.
Heaven seems nearer, dearest,
To know our loved one is there.

Inserted by wife.

Noted Arctic Explorer Describes Term "Igloo"

Vilhjalmur Stefansson, noted Arctic explorer, has entered the growing controversy over the proper use of foreign words in the latest issue of "Science."

Confining his views to the field in which he is famous, Mr. Stefansson has questioned the usage of the Eskimo word "iglu" or "igloo" as synonymous with snowhouse.

Quoting Samuel Kleinschmidt, an authority on the language of the Eskimo, Stefansson points out that "iglu" is derived from "ikiva," so that the fundamental meaning is "some place where one can lay or shelter himself from the weather."

From a lifetime spent among the Eskimos Stefansson points out that "iglu" is used as a term for a dwelling place of any semi-permanent form as long as the phrase is in the dialect.

Of the estimated 40,000 population of the Eskimo in all countries there are probably only 10,000 who have ever seen a snowhouse. Stefansson reasons that if we must use adjectives and qualifying phrases to indicate which type of house the Eskimo lives in, we should be specific in saying sodhouse, snowhouse, earthcovered loghouse or dwelling. This he feels will go far to overcome the storybook and motion picture presentation that all Eskimos live in houses of ice or snow.

Great-Horned Owl

By WALKER YOUNG
in "Animal Life"

Occasionally in the twilight hours there can be heard a deep, mournful call of "Hoo! Hoo-hoo! Hoo-hoo—oo!" the cry of a great-horned owl about to start on his nightly hunt. They are to be found in every state in the Union, from the northern part of Maine to the arid desert regions of Arizona, and also in Alaska, Canada, and Mexico. There has been much propaganda circulated recently to the effect that these owls are harmful, and have no redeeming points. Those people of concerns which have published this information have not considered the varied country in which these owls live, and naturally the varied food which each locality affords. They have condemned this interesting bird from food statistics gained in regions where rabbits are a game animal, and therefore something to be protected. They have not carried their investigations to localities where rabbits are a pest—and where rabbits are the staple food of the great-horned owl.

Last year I was carrying on some investigations with a nest of these birds near Tuscon, Arizona, and was surprised at the number of rabbits and smaller rodents that the adults brought to the young in a single night. Oftentimes when climbing the ladder to the crotch of the giant saguaro cactus in which reposed their nest, I was greeted by three or four pairs of long rabbit ears, and the partly-devoured carcasses of several kangaroo rats and chipmunks. Out of about a hundred meals they had eaten only two birds of value, one quail and one roadrunner. There was a chicken farm a few hundred yards away, yet even with this alluring food so close to them, no poultry feathers were to be found about the nest, and the owner of the chickens reported no losses.

Yeomen of the Guard

Do you know that they are the oldest bodyguard and oldest military corps existing in any country? Henry VII. instituted them as a Royal Bodyguard in 1485, and they fought with him on Bosworth Field.

They were originally responsible for the safety of the Sovereign within doors, and guarded the interior of the Palace. They brought up the King's food and "tasted" it for fear of poison, and performed the daily ceremonial of "making the King's bed." For this custom derive the initials Y.B.H. (Yeoman Bed-hanger) and Y.B.G. (Yeomen Bed-goers) still affixed to certain Yeomen on the Roll.

They still dress as they did in Tudor days, with Tudor cap, coat of Royal scarlet with trimmings of Imperial purple, and gold lace and ribbons of red, white, and blue, together with the ruff which was added in Elizabeths reign.

"Their function," says Mr. H. Clifford Smith in "Buckingham Palace" is still to "uphold the dignity and grandeur of the English Crown." When the King opens Parliament a Yeoman armed with his partisan marches in line with each wheel of the Royal coach, and eight others with a sergeant-major immediately behind.

Garden Tlaks

Growing Plants

The plants started from seed in the shallow boxes on the window sill or in the hot-bed will be ready to transplant if the second set of leaves has developed. Transplanting checks the tendency to grow tall and spindly. It strengthens the roots and stems and gives the plant more room and, therefore, a chance to really develop. All of the normal bedding plants, such as Cosmos, Zinnias, Petunias, Asters, Marigold and similar flowers, as well as Tomatoes, Cabbage, Head Lettuce, Celery and other vegetables should be treated in this way. Give them an inch or so each way and place in shallow boxes filled with fine soil in which there is provision for drainage. Water well after transplanting and keep them away from full sun for a couple of days until they have hardened. A pinch of nitrate of soda will bring the plants along quickly after the moving. To prevent unevenness the box should be moved around from time to time so that all plants will get a chance next to the light.

Good Flowers

For the person who wants a good show of annual flowers but is not any too familiar with the different varieties the following list is suggested for general satisfaction: Calliopsis, Linum, Scabbiosis, Cosmos, Bachelor's Buttons; the seed of these can be sown direct in the early spring. Marigolds, Phlox, Zinnias, Snapdragons; these can be planted direct as seed or small plants used. Asters and Petunias are best purchased as plants or the seed may be sown early in hotbeds or window flats.

Mulch Paper

Growth can be hastened and weeds checked by the use of mulch paper, which is now highly recommended by Government authorities for the home garden. This is simply tough black paper, coming in various widths, which is tacked down with wire staples or laths between the rows of vegetables. The paper absorbs the sun's rays and heats up the ground and also collects the rainfall which runs into the ground along the rows where it is most needed. With those semi-tender and tender vegetables, such as Corn, Tomatoes, Mellons and similar things, growth is very materially hastened, which is a most important point where the season is short, or where extra early vegetables are wanted. Moreover, this new mulch eliminates practically all cultivation. Gardeners are advised to at least cover a portion of their vegetable patch with this paper.

Ready for Planting

If the weather will allow working in the garden and the soil is not wet enough to muddy one's feet, this is the proper time to get in the first vegetables, such as Radish, Spinach, Lettuce, Carrots, the first Cabbages and other of the hardier sorts. It is also time to dig the soil in preparation for later seeding. Dig deeply and turn in some well-rotted manure or some good commercial mixtures and before the seed is actually sown rake over three or four times to break up the lumps. Use a stout string so that rows will be straight and, if possible, run them north and south, so that all vegetables will obtain the maximum light. The narrow sorts, such as Lettuce, Beets, Carrots, Radish and Cress can be put in rows twelve or fifteen inches apart where horse cultivation is not used, while Beans, Corn, Cabbages and Tomatoes require from eighteen to thirty-six inches. To save space it is a good plan to alternate the quick-maturing sorts, such as Leaf Lettuce, Spinach and Radish with Beets, Corn and Tomatoes, before the later sown and later maturing sorts will require the full room and the earlier stuff will be out of the way. Tomatoes should be staked, using stakes six feet high, and when this practice is followed two feet between plants each way will be sufficient. To be tender, vegetables must be grown quickly and this means frequent cultivation, watering when necessary and plenty of fertilizer.

Cologne Youth Hostel To Be Enlarged

Cologne.—The Cologne Jugendherberge, one of the largest and most modern youth inns in Germany, has become so popular with young hikers that it has been found necessary to add 590 beds in an adjoining building to the 610 already provided, making a total of 1,200. In the three years since it was opened this Jugendherberge has accommodated 161,500 wanderers. The number of guests from abroad rose from 3,863 in 1929 to 5,932 in 1930.

CHARACTER

How Our Houses Will Be Built In the Future

(Excerpt from Ladies' Home Journal, April 1931, Norman Bel Geddes, noted stage and industrial designer.)

Structurally the houses in which we live to-day have changed but little since the days of Queen Elizabeth. The styles of the past were excellent in their day; but this, most emphatically, is not their day.

For hundreds of years it has been considered impossible, in temperate climates, to build houses with flat roofs, because the weight of accumulated snow during winter was too great for them to bear. With steel construction it is perfectly possible to have a flat roof and so provide our house with enormously greater space.

Land is becoming increasingly expensive, particularly near great cities; people are building their houses with less and less garden space around them. Here the flat roof comes in conveniently. Instead of having a tiny garden which is overshadowed by the building around it, we can put our garden on the roof.

It has always been the custom to place the living rooms facing the street, in the most overlooked and least private position, and the service quarters at the back. In the 20th-century house we reverse the order and have our living room secluded from the street and facing such little garden as we may have.

This has a double advantage. There is no reason for placing the garage at the back in a separate building. It means that there must be a driveway, which of necessity cuts down on valuable space, and involves serious problems of heating in winter. How much more sensible, surely, to place the garage on the street side of the house and make it part of the house itself. If the kitchen is also at the front, there is no necessity for a service alley.

In considering new materials available to-day, one is struck and inspired by their variety. The natural materials, such as wood and stone, are rapidly giving way to the products of the laboratory. From an architectural point of view these synthetic materials will be vastly superior; steel can never crack or warp; stone can crack, but not properly prepared concrete.

In addition to these, however, there are all the various varieties of stainless-steel alloys, which are so decorative and so hard wearing.

There is, for example, a certain alloy of chromium, nickel and iron, which is stronger than carbon steel. When polished, which it may be to a mirrorlike brilliance, it will resist for years the corrosive action of water, atmosphere and acid. It can be finished in a matte silver, which is most attractive for exterior fittings, or in its polished form it can be used in the interior in a thousand ways—sink lining, laundry chutes, or the more decorative purposes, such as lighting fixtures and furniture.

When people are building a house, and the architect proposes something a little original and different from the usual, they are apt to take fright. Gradually, however, they are beginning to realize that if their houses are to be improved, they must be prepared to jettison some of the old ideas and ideals, and some progress is being made.—The Reader's Digest.

One Name Village

Northamptonshire, (England), can boast of a village in which one-third of the inhabitants possess the same surname. This is Bozeat, which has a population of just over a thousand. Nearly three hundred of them have the surname of Drage.

Many villages and small towns can show surprising numbers of a few surnames amongst their inhabitants, but nowhere else is such a large percentage of people with the same name to be found. It is difficult to discover how it all happened. Surnames are a comparatively modern institution, for in the old days there were none. To distinguish between two Williams, one might be referred to as William, Robert's son, and the other William from Handley. In course of time this was shortened to William Robertson and William Handley. Or, again, a man might be known by his trade, John the smith becoming John Smith.

Where the Drages came from is a mystery, for there is no mention of them in the old records.

"Living Stone" in Sculpture

"Living stone" and "living rock" are applied in sculpture to rock or stone in its native or original position as contrasted with marble or granite which has been quarried. The Lion of Luzerne in Switzerland, the Rushmore Memorial in South Dakota and the Confederate Memorial on Stone Mountain in Georgia were all carved from living rock.—The Pathfinder.

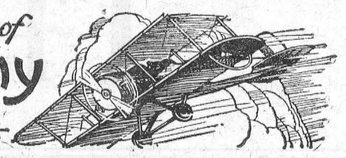
The ADVENTURES of CAPTAIN JIMMY and his Dog SCOTTIE



What came before: After many adventures flying over the war zone in China, Captain Jimmy and Scottie get lost in the dark and land in enemy territory. A freight train leaves supplies at a siding, and they are cautiously approaching, when interrupted.

Quietly we approached the freight train. The food and gasoline which we needed so badly would soon be ours. Then, right out of the ground leaped a dark form. A heavy blow landed on my head, and I knew no more.

Gradually I became conscious. Jolt — jolt — jolt! I tried to put my hands to my head but they were securely bound. Someone had tied me on the back of a burro, and just ahead the Colonel and Fu Hsu were securely bound on two more. Numberless other donkeys loaded with bundles and boxes moved in single file along a narrow rocky path, and leading each, strode a wicked looking ruffian, armed to the teeth. Chinese bandits had captured us.

Jolt—jolt—jolt! Through the hills we went, while a great blazing sun scorched us with stifling heat. The bandits had plenty of water, but for us, never a drop. Between drinks they would grin at us, and pat their stomachs, seeming to enjoy our misery. Of Scottie I knew nothing, and became very anxious as to his fate.

Everything must end sometime. Toward nightfall we came in sight of a rift in the mountains, where the sheer cliffs rose for hundreds of feet into the air. Here, indeed, was an ideal spot for a bandit camp. A few men could hold the defile against an army. Below stretched a beautiful valley, green and fresh as a mountain paradise.

The burros, scenting the sweet grass, rushed down toward the bandit camp in a regular stampede. As we approached, a miserable looking mob of men, women and children, swarmed out of the tents.

They were a hard-bitten crowd, every one of them. They jeered at us, and the children pelted us with soft mud. But finally my turn came. Suddenly I dug my toes into that burro and charged the mob. He bowled several over, and in a moment the camp was in an uproar. One fat fellow stood in my way, but that donkey just butted him in the belt, and he landed kerplunk on the side of a tent. After that we galloped off into the night before anyone could saddle a horse.

Up the valley, I found a cliff with sharp edged rocks. Working close to it, I began to rub the ropes which bound my wrists, on the rough surface. Then lights began to twinkle here and there in the valley, as the bandits set out to hunt for me with torches. Five minutes, ten, fifteen, I rubbed those tough ropes, while the lights came nearer, then, just as I had given up hope—they snapped and I was free!

My arms were so numb that I was almost as helpless as a baby. Up and down the valley bobbed the torches—and each torch was carried by a man-hunter. I edged close into the cliff, while the feeling gradually came back into my hands.

Fortunately for me, no one came near my hiding place. Whenever a bandit's torch went out, he would make a dash for camp, so as not to be left alone in the darkness. Probably he was afraid of a dragon jumping on his back, and flying away with him to its den. Anyhow, the torches went out one by one, and the search ended for the time. Soon the camp quieted down. Sentries paced to and fro, but as the night wore on, even these huddled close to the dying camp fires, and dozed in the fitful light.

Just the ideal time for a raid! No one would ever expect a prisoner to suddenly attack a camp full of armed men. Cautiously I set out toward the tents.

Holiday Tours by Plane

The latest idea in holidays in England is light aeroplane tours to the Continent, by means of which amateur pilots can combine a very pleasant trip, with visits to interesting places, with the gaining of flying experience.

The tours are led by experienced pilots, and the planes will keep together as much as possible. But as machines of different types—and different capabilities—are taking part, every pilot will have to know something about navigation.

Light aeroplane flying is becoming increasingly popular in Great Britain, and the clubs formed to organize it have received a good deal of encouragement from the authorities. So far as these clubs turn out efficient pilots, they are, of course, adding to the air reserves of the country.—"Answers."

It's Easy To Talk

It's easy to talk
Of the place you would fill
If someone would push you along;
But the task now for you
Is the work you can do,
To idle and grumble is wrong.

It's easy to talk
Of the money you'd spend
If you had a few dollars ahead;
But it's better to give
A bit while you live
Than a million after you're dead.

It's easy to talk
Of the good you have planned
As soon as you feel fancy free;
But talk does not count
In any amount
To meet a real exigency.

It's easy to talk
To tell and to boast
Of the things you some day will do;
But the work will appraise
Your work and your ways
And pass it's own judgment on you.

BOYS AND CRIME

g the past few weeks in this Christian province of Ontario n five boys, all under the age of twenty years, have been by magistrates to terms in prison and to receive the prison to twenty of them, before they leave the prison walls. me was that of robbery with violence. Hold-up men they led and as such regarded in the eyes of the law and society as g the severest punishment. The lash to be applied to oung lads is no doubt intended to be a corrective measure, warning to them, and others, that the course of crime is sure to ts punishment and that the law is not to be trifled with. In se of three of the lads, their parents are respectable citizens e heart-broken because of the crimes their boys have been guilty of. They had no idea that their sons were engaged in nlawful acts, or why and how they were led into crime and to on cell, and to carry all through their life the scar of prison . It is not the intention of this article to preach a sermon, or out some of the many reasons why young lads of respected ts and good homes are led astray. Some say neglect and lack ntrol on the part of the parents. Some charge it to the literary age that accumulates on the exposed news stands, telling of adventure and criminal notoriety so common in the United es. Young lads who are full of life and love adventure, but who ot receive proper parental control, advice, and guidance, are car- away in imagination by such sensational tales of lawless charac- , who receive altogether too much notoriety in the daily press. In opinion of the Winchester Press it is a sad mistake to subject lad under twenty years of age to the prison lash. In nine cases en it will have the very opposite effect intended. It is more o stir up in a spirited youth a feeling of hatred for law and ity and a desire for revenge. It sends him out into the world, d, in his own mind, as a criminal with scars of the lash on his There are some crimes for which the lash may be justified, apply it to young lads who, if the real truth was known, had ught of the real seriousness of the crimes they were engaged o were carried away by the excitement of the prospects, and ssession of real money which was to bring them luxuries their ation built up. The man of mature years who deliberately and systematically robs his employer and the public, gets off few years of prison confinement. The young lad who, carried for the moment by the exciting thought of adventure and pos- n of some wealth, yields to the impulse and is caught, is not ent to prison, but sentenced to be forever branded with the n lash. There is really something very inconsistent in a system permits such unjust discrimination.

These figures are worth preserving for comparison with those hich will be compiled following the approaching census. They early show that some of the communities in this part of the prov- ce have had their ups and downs, with the larger centres profitting the expense of the smaller ones. Solid, substantial growth has ken place over the years in the cases of several places that are list- , whilst others have steadily declined in population, largely through e closing of village industries, until to-day they have only the emories of their former strength and prosperity to console them. t it cannot be denied that in practically every one of the commun- es enumerated, even if population has declined, there has been a tterment of living conditions and a marked improvement in ap- earance and facilities.—Brockville Recorder-Times.

ENFORCING LAWS

The law regulating the driving of automobiles and trucks is un oubtedly evaded and defied more than any other law on the tatute books. Even the old Prohibition or Temperance Act was ore respected and better enforced than is the law regulating the iving of automobiles. Yet no one thinks for a moment that the egulating automobiles should be done away with because it is forced. In fact it would take an army of officers to enforce affic law, and then many would go unmolested. How many of cars on the highway to-day would stand the test against poor akes? How many drivers on the road carry their permits? How ny young boys and girls are seen driving who are under age? Any ht you meet dozens and dozens of cars with glare headlights and t as many with only one headlight or without a tail light. How y drivers observe the necessary signs when turning off or on a way, when passing other cars, when coming to a hill. Many ple are killed every week because of the non-obsevance of the hway Traffic Act.

PLAYING TO THE GALLERY

The Municipal Council of the Township of Finch are trying to press themselves on the community as economists. They have nsented to a reduction of 10% of their allowance of $4. per day hen they attend Council, and of course have obliged their munici- al officials to a like reduction. The township will probably save hirty or forty dollars by this wonderful display of self sacrifice on he part of the Council, and when election time comes about they will be sounding their praises to the electors because of their great oncern for their welfare. If the members of the Finch Township Council wanted to show that they were in earnest and meant busi- ness, they should have cut out the whole allowance of $4. per day nd left the small salaries of their officials remain as it was. It looks ike a nigger in the fence somewhere.

ABOUT MOTHER'S DAY

Mother's Day has become a day of "Hold-up" on the part of sts and an extravagance on the part of too many. When the ists, or those dealing in flowers, can ask and receive 25c to 35c for ngle carnation and from 35c to 50c for a single rose bud, because Mother's Day has made a big demand, it is time to call a halt, and either change the date of Mother's Day to a month when flowers are more abundant, or cut out the flower wearing altogether. A white or red ribbon would signify and tell as much. Then again, Mother's Day is being somewhat overdone. And this we say without any dis- respect or lack of reverance for dear mother, but because it has been made a sort of celebration day.

On a Spring Day at Slater's End

By MALACHI WHITAKER

People still take their Sunday walks up the hill to Slater's End, though much of the view is now obscured by the bright new houses which will in their turn grow mellow, crumble, and hel to form fresh dust for the quiet green grass to cover. But you can walk higher than any houses have yet gone, climb over a lumpy stone wall, and find yourself on a wild moor, where sheep shun you and curlews cry; and if you are strong-wlled and ready to walk in steep places, you will come quickly to The Nab; and over The Nab—on the wild side, not the sheltered one—is the small, walled cemetery known as Slater's End.

Only the very oldest folks are buried there now. For the road is bad, and they have to be "walked"; but if they say "Slater's End," it has to be Slater's End, these old women who still wear their bonnets to chapel, and these old men who are sure of eternal salvation for themselves and eternal damnation for most other people. If they have been harsh to their children and driven them away; if they have oftenest got "rayther the better side of a bargain"; if they have pinched and saved, and denied themselves and theirs pleasure, heaven is open to them. They have, at any rate, kept away from the sins of the flesh. Yet long ago, the young were carried here, too.

One spring morning—not a Sunday, so they were alone on the road—an old, old man and his granddaughter were walking up the hill. They peered with interest into the gardens of the new bungalows, admiring the neat rows of daffodils, always late in this cold part of the country, which lined the straight, cemented paths.

The little girl had a round, rosy face, direct, wondering brown eyes, and comical little tufts and tails of brown hair which straggled over her cheek. Each time they got in front of her eyes she would say "Oh, dear!" and push them back under her hat. But the puffs of wind, which came apparently from nowhere, always dislodged them again. And at length she would cry out, in imitation of some admired elder, "Grandpa, just look at my ridiculous hair!"

The old man walked at an even pace, tapping the ground now and then with his stout cherrywood stick. He was glad of the pale, warm sunlight, and of the song of half-a-dozen larks which grew now louder, now fainter. His eyes and ears and legs were good yet, he thought thankfully. The hair was off the middle of his head; he had a tonsure, surely the most becoming way for a man to lose his hair. If there was some at the front, where you could see it yourself, and some at the back, where other folk could see it, what more could you want?

He had the long face, with its long upper lip, and the tight, grim mouth of the moorland folk. The color of his eyes was almost washed away, but it had been palest blue, even in his youth. He was dressed in the black suit which he had had for over thirty years, and for overcoat wore a sort of black frock-coat, with two buttons at the back. In the flap of this he carried a spotted red and yellow handkerchief, on which he liked to blow his nose with a loud, challenging sound.

He was of the old breed, yet time had subtly softened him. There was the post-office, where he drew not only his old-age pension, but also a pension due to the death of an unmarried son in the Army. There were the "pictures," to which everybody, including his independent daughter Marion Alice, went. These, he resisted with a cunning "Nay." And there was the wireless, which even his authority could not keep out of the house. For this, he had a secret fondness, but would pretend that he did not care for it when other people were in.

Up the road went the two. Sometimes the little girl took hold of her grandfather's hand, sometimes she ran from his side to pick a flower or a piece of grass; and sometimes they rested for a while, leaning against a wall, both staring dreamily at the opposite hill, which seemed to be lying with its head at rest against the bosom of the cloudless sky. Then off they would go again.

In one garden there was a row of washing hanging on a line, swaying gently. A woman in a white apron and a blue mob-cap came out of a door carrying a creaking basket filled with wet, folded white sheets and towels. She smiled and called out, "A lovely morning, isn't it?" The child stared at her, unsmiling, while her grandfather answered solemnly, "It is, indeed," and went tapping his way upwards.

When they came to the wall, he climbed over it with stiff legs, and the child threw her roundedness forward and scrambled over. "Are we going right to the top?" she asked, and went running forward without waiting for an answer. She had seen a lamb, separated from its mother. It was afraid of her, and did not know which way to turn, so it opened its mouth wide and bleated. Silently, with bobbing motion, the old sheep approached, looking at the child with a mixture of menace and fear. She stopped, gazed at the sheep with wide eyes, and ran back to the old man, shouting, "Grandpa, hide me, hide me quick!" When she looked out from the flap of his coat, there was nothing to be seen; the sheep and the lamb were hidden behind a rock. And for a long time she walked quietly.

"Where are we going?" she kept asking. Or, "Grandfather, what's that?" as they saw a hare, quite near. The old man was absorbed in his thoughts, and did not answer her. "I know. I know; it's a rabbit," she answered herself. "A rabbit, a rabbit; hurry, a rabbit!" She jumped over the tufts of hard, rough grass on to the bright green pieces which had been nibbled close, finding a hundred things of interest. She picked up a broken bottle, and for a long time carried a piece of the bluish glass carefully before she tired of it and threw it away.

She ran up to the old man, patting his leg above the knee with her chubby hands. "Is it far, grandpa? Is it far to the top?"

"Not so far, now," he said, "and then we'll have a rest." He felt in his pocket, slowly. There was the sound of the crackling of a paper bag, and with difficulty he brought out of it a piece of toffee, which he gave to his little granddaughter, who stood near him with sparkling, expectant eyes and eager mouth half open. She pushed the toffee into the side of her mouth and sucked noisily and contentedly.

They came very suddenly on the top of the hill. There was a triangular platform, sheltered by a large rock twice the height of a man and three times the length of one. It was grassy, but cropped almost to the dust by the sheep. The little girl flung herself down and rolled about like a puppy, and the old man sat on a knoll, resting his chin on cupped hands, his elbows on his knees, his cherrywood stick beside him on the ground.

Although his eyes followed her for a while, his thoughts were in the past. Sixty years it was, or more, since Lily had died. And here he was, up at Slater's End, not many yards from where her bones were lying, remembering not the life which had come between, but that short year when he had known Lily.

He could see her face now as he saw it then. Pale, with just a little color in her cheeks when the wind put it there. Her hair had been flaxen when she was a baby, she had told him, but it had grown a deep golden brown with the years. She had grey-green eyes with tiny pupils, a large nose, and a pretty, crooked mouth. She had small ears, pressed close to her head, and dressed her hair to show them. She was very thin, so thin that when he thought about her slightness, his heart contracted with pain.

She was seventeen when he first saw her. She had known trouble and responsibility already, and these had drawn grave shadows across her face; but as she met him, a beautiful smile had come over her like sunshine, and driven those shadows away.

They had not a great deal to say to each other when first they met, boy and girl in the spinning mill; and they had plenty of work to do. Yet on every pretext, the boy was down at her end of the room, just to see that she was still all right.

It was a long time, almost six months, before he dare ask her if she would go with him for a walk. "I don't know," she had said, in her shy way, "I'll see." And he waited for a long time one day, until at last she came.

"I thought you'd have gone," she told him, breathlessly, when she saw him standing in the shadow of a high wall at the bottom of the mill-master's garden. "I'd have come before, but I couldn't get out."

"That's all right," he said, gruffly. And his heart was crying, "I'd have waited for you for ever, you beautiful little dove."

"How d'you like it at the mill, then?"

They strolled along, that first time, talking mainly about their work, and about a little man at the mill called Edgar, who was henpecked, and always getting into trouble. She grew animated, and laughed at his jokes. "I didn't know you could be funny as well as kind," she said. And they wondered what the stars really were, and why the moon looked just like it did. And they were silent for a long time, thinking vague thoughts; walking a little apart, happy to be with each other.

They met again and again, but she could not walk so far as on that first night. "I don't know how it is," she said, "I've never felt like this before. I used to be as strong as strong when I was a little 'un."

One Sunday they arranged to get up early and walk to Slater's End. "It's grand up there," he told her, "with the larks and all. You can see for miles around. Let's hope it won't rain!"

The morning had been perfect, just as this one was. "We've got to get down in time for me to cook dinner," she said. That was why they had gone so early. And there were no bushes then to carry them half-way up the hill. She had on her best frock of dark green, with a white frill at the neck and wrists. And she had on a little green velvet bonnet. He could see the knot of hair in her neck just as plainly now as he did that day.

She let him take her hand to help her up. Her eyelids were strangely heavy, and not even the touch of the wind put color in her cheeks. "I don't know why I'm so tired," she kept saying. But it did not occur to either of them to forego the excursion. It had been planned, so it must be carried out.

Up the road they walked. There were no houses there yet, only fields reclaimed from the moorland. The lane became a path, which dwindled away to the merest track. "I will get to the top," Lily said, gritting her teeth in determination. When they came to the wall she sat down. "Let's wait a bit," she said. "We've time yet."

Just such another blue sky, he remembered, with the opposite hill resting its smooth cheek against the sky as it was to-day. He had put his arm about her shoulders. "Lily," he had said, looking down at her, "Lily." And then he kissed her.

They had almost raced up to the top of the hill. They laughed and teased one another, and rested breathless on the ridge at the top of the hill. "Isn't it——? Isn't it——?" They couldn't find a word to say of what they thought about it all. He could hardly look at the distant view, when here was Lily, near him. He wanted to kiss her again. Clumsily he pressed towards her. "Lily, lass?" he questioned.

But as the boy looked towards her, terror came over him. She had leaned forward, her eyes were closed, and bright blood was trickling from the side of her mouth.

"Lily!" he called. "Open your eyes. What's the matter, lass?" But she continued leaning forward slowly, so that she would have fallen but for the pull of his hand; and the blood ran on her white collar and down her neck as if it were seeking some hiding-place.

His trembling hand tried to brush it away, but more came. So he gathered her up in his arms and set off down the hill, falling over the hummocks, cursing them, cursing the larks which sang so loud and maddeningly round him, cursing the bright, blind sunshine and the lonely hillside. And presently, she was in her house; and after that, she was dead, and he took some flowers to lie near her, and climbed the hill to Slater's End again.

And quite soon, while he was still a boy, he married Maggie Halliday, and now, here he was, his little granddaughter beside him, the years fled away like seeds of grass in the wind. There were his sons and daughters down in the valley, with their sons and daughters; and up here, the old man sat with his dream.

The little girl had tired of the rest, and run away. She had found her way to the rusty gate of the walled graveyard, and was looking through it with interested eyes. She still clutched the cherrywood walking-stick in her hands. The old man's voice came to her from far away, "Come along, Becky, come along home to dinner."

"Home to dinner, home to dinner,
There's the bell, there's the bell,
Pudding and potatoes, pudding and potatoes,
Ding, dong, dell. Ding, dong, dell," she sang, and ran to take hold of her grandfather's hand.—"John O'London's Weekly."

Still Largest Tree

Vancouver, B.C. — According to British Columbia lumbermen the record for the largest tree ever cut down still rests with the Lynn Valley Douglas fir which was 417 feet high, being 300 feet to the first limb. It was 25 feet in diameter and 77 feet in circumference, and was believed to be about 2,000 years old. "There is probably no other tree that will ever surpass in size this giant fir," says the "Canada Lumberman," "except as botanical specimens. No lumber corporation could afford to let a tree grow to such an age."

New Zealand: Land of Wonders

A Place of Volcanoes, Geysers and Rich Plains

By RUSSELL OWEN
In The New York Times

New Zealand, tucked away in the corner of the Pacific, is a laboratory of nature. It is a new land, inhabited even by the natives only a little more than 500 years. Its isolation has made it a pioneer in social legislation, and its humbling and mountainous surface, through which leak the steam and smoke of subterranean infernos, make it a fascinating place geologically.

New Zealand is a land of the sea. It is nowhere more than 250 miles wide, though it is 1,000 miles long. Its snow-capped mountains look down on the surf-beaten rocks of fjords; its plains lie behind sandy beaches; the smell of salt is in the air. Ao Tea Roa the native Maoris called it, "The Long White Cloud"—so it seemed to them, resting on the water when they paddled their way to it from the north.

Its history is as dramatic as its scenery. The first great navigators, Cook among them, admired it and left it to be neglected for many years. It is only ninety years old as a colony and the settlers were fighting fierce wars with the natives while the Civil War was raging in the United States. Its volcanoes still smoke and the earth sometimes shakes, but now Maori and white man live side by side in amity, both citizens of their common land. The native votes, takes his seat in Parliament and is knighted by the King, while the New Zealander is proud of his dark brother's acceptance of civilization, and tells stories of native courage and sportsmanship in war.

It is a land of variety—of magnificent bush country where the tree ferns lift their broad fronds in a tangled jungle through which one can walk without fear of any dangerous animal; of Alpine mountains clothed with snow, around whose shoulders crawl great glaciers; of tree-dotted pastures, neat and trim, like those of old England; of warm fields where the palm and the orange grow. There is no more unspoiled country in the world and none so free from marauding beasts. The only native mammal is a bat; there are no snakes, and in the forests are wingless and timid birds which have forgotten, in their security, how to fly.

The only danger to life is from volcanic activity. Part of the country seems slumbering uneasily over a thin crust of earth which might explode at any moment. The ground is hot to the touch; steam and sulphur fumes rise in the calm air. Although the inhabitants are used to the eccentricities of this thermal belt and have made part of it into tourist parks, it is a region to inspire awe in the casual visitor. Only once in its recorded history has this laboratory of Vulcan blown death and destruction over the land—the day when the long-sleeping volcano Tarawera flung its cone and an an entire lake into the air, and for hours poured molten rock, hot mud and ash over the surrounding country.

This thermal region stretches from south to Lake Taupo in the centre of the North Island—New Zealand is composed of numerous small islets—to White Island in the Bay of Plenty, an area of 6,000 square miles. Volcanoes smoke lazily against the blue sky, hills show the clefts made by outbreaks of the past, whole plains are dismal wildernesses of pumice, and in concentrated areas the earth puffs out jets of stream, geysers shoot into the air and hot springs bubble and hiss next to streams of cold water. Trout have been caught in a cool stream and cooked in a hot pool a few feet away.

The volcanoes, it is believed, are slowly subsiding and the other curious phenomena are more objects of interest to the traveler than portents of internal upheavals. The city of Auckland, largest in the country, is built in an area of extinct volcanoes. There are dozens of dead cones in the city, some of them in parks where one can look down into their grass-covered craters. Once all the northern part of the country must have been a belching terror, a vent-hole for the fires of the earth.

Oddly enough the volcanic region is also the home of the most beautiful lakes in the island, the largest of which, Taupo, the Maoris call "The Sea." South of Taupo on a clear day can be seen the triple cones of Tongariro, smoking idly. And near this lake, famous for its fishing, is the Wairakei Valley, a delightful little hell of hot pools and geysers. There the Champagne caldron boils restlessly, rising and falling as it gurgles and roars.

The crystal clear water of a geyser pool stirs and lifts up and down as if in agony before shooting its hot spray into the air. Paths by which one walks through this smoking crack in the earth sometimes echo hollowly, and a finger poked in the ground is burned by the internal heat. Gases escape through mud pools with dull "plops," leaving tiny fumaroles, which slowly subside and disappear. A temperamental geyser, half covered with a stone, pounds at its lid in a series of hammerlike blows until it gathers strength enough to lift it entirely and spray out sidewise.

This valley and the better known Rotorua are the centres of travel in the thermal regions, but all through the district in out-of-the-way spots are similar outbreaks, and riding along the road one can see jets of steam rising from the ground. In those who see it for the first time the phenomenon produces a strange feeling of insecurity, of treading on gigantic forces, which is intensified when at night one visits a crevice where for generations a jet of superheated steam under terrific pressure has blown off with a deafening roar.

But appalling as are some of these outbreaks they are treated with familiar disdain by the Maoris, even though occasionally some one slips into a boiling pool and is cooked. The natives use the thermal waters to prepare their food; they bathe in the lukewarm pools; they even wash their clothes in them. And they apologize for some old geyser which has grown weary and quit.

Most of the Maoris live near the thermal regions in the North Island. A few of their old villages survive, but they now prefer the white man's type of dwelling and dress in native costume only for the entertainment of visitors. They are educated; many of them go to college, becoming doctors or lawyers. They are eloquent and graceful speakers. It was once thought that they were a dying race, but the adoption of white customs and sanitation has saved rather than ruined them. They are a singularly gentle people despite their former savagery and occasional cannibalism and their ability as fighters. Even in their greatest strife with the English settlers they often showed good qualities.

A favorite New Zealand story is of a Maori tribe which had surrounded some English soldiers. The whites fought as long as their ammunition held out, and then waited for the final native charge. The Maoris soon perceived what had crippled their enemies and sent out a messenger with a flag of truce to take some powder to the English lines. There was no honor to be gained in fighting a foe which could not fight back.

France to Build 400,000 Houses In Algeria For 2 Cents Daily Rent

Paris—Four thousand new villages are to be built for the use of the native population of Algeria. This is part of a vast fifty-year program designed to solve the chief problems of the most advanced of the French possessions in northern Africa. The project, which is being worked out here at conferences between Algerian representatives and officials of the home Government, will involve an outlay of $2,000,000,000. Work will begin as soon as details of financing are settled.

Building the new villages will require the construction of 400,000 dwellings to replace the "gourbis" in which the natives now live. The rent of the new dwellings will be 200 francs a year for each, or slightly more than 2 cents a day, with provision for purchase by the tenants.

Another part of the program is the encouragement of agriculture by supplying native farmers with a minimum of 50,000 plows and 100,000 draft animals as a beginning. Schools, clinics and social services will be established in the villages.

No Posters in Palestine

Norman Bentwich in the English Review (London): In the Holy Land the British administration brought out as its first law an order for the control of advertisements, and notices displayed in the countryside are entirely illegal. The managers of the big firms admit that the saving of expense to their business is enormous. The law forbids all persons to advertise in that way; and so there is no loss in not advertising. The excellence of goods must be proved in a more satisfactory and intelligent way. Today, with the vast circulation of the Press and the cheapness of the post, these crudities which deface the countryside should be obsolete everywhere. They belong to an age long past.

Air Parties to Hunt Gold In Sands of Arctic Rivers

Point Barrow, Alaska.—Gold lies in all the streams flowing into the Arctic from Alaska and Canada, declare Eskimos here who exhibit bits of the yellow metal. Few of these streams have been prospected by white men because of their inaccesibility. However, this summer several airplane parties will test the sands of the Kobuk, Anapikpuk, Colville and Maude Rivers.

The short season for placer mining begins in July and closes the middle of September. The Arctic streams yield an exceptionally yellow gold which is worth more than the darker metal for jewelry and dental work.

Why Swiss Lakes Are Blue

Travelers long have marveled at the beautiful azure color of the lakes in the Tyrolean Alps, and chemical compounds in the water were generally believed to cause the color. Recent analysis, however, shows the lakes to be free from coloring matter. Scientists therefore have decided that the hue is due to reflection and refraction of the azure sky in colorless water, particularly since the azure color changes to gray as the sun declines. Other localities do not have the deep-blue water coloring because they are not favored with clear blue skies.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Giant Ice Crystals Formed Only Once By Nature

Giant ice crystals, up to eighteen inches across, are found at only one place in the world, in the famous Kungur ice caves of the Ural mountains. Russian scientists recently returned from these caverns with striking photographs of the fantastic structures taken by water in these remote grottoes. Snowflakes are seen under the microscope as delicate six-pointed crystals, and hailstones, on rare occasions, have been found to consist of crystals visible without magnification, but the huge cave crystals are more beautiful than either. They are hollow and six-angled, with a curious spiral geometry, showing the intricate effects of window-pane frost projected into three dimensions. The ice is deposited like hoarfrost by the cooling of moist air as it passes outward through the caves.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.

Birds of Bayazid Mosque Doomed to Seek New Home

The fate of the city pigeons in London, writes a correspondent of "The London Sunday Observer," has its parallel in Stambul, where also considerations of hygiene are to prevail over those of sentiment. The old woman selling grain on the courtyard of the Bayazid Mosque has been forbidden to continue her trade. The pigeons will have to settle somewhere else or starve.

Pigeons have always been held sacred in Turkey; their usual abode is the court of a mosque.

Those of the Bayazid Mosque have a touching origin. The original pair, according to the legend, were offered to Sultan Bayazid for his mosque by a poor widow as a thank-offering for her son's recovery from illness. Their offspring today number many hundreds.

The measure taken by the municipality is said to have originated in a quarrel between the old woman who sells the grain and a shopkeeper in the square, who took revenge by complaining to the authorities of the damage caused by the birds. But the sentiment of the pigeon-loving population has been aroused and the society for the protection of animals has petitioned the municipality in the interest of the birds.

A Hothouse of Surprises

The professor of agriculture at Tuskegee had one day explained to me the influence of his simple object-lessons in rousing the intellectual interest in boys and girls to whom the printed page had little or no meaning. Hardly a year before there had come to him a lad whose attempts to meet even the lowest literary requirements of the school had failed. Could he be permitted to sit in the "class for farming"? This permission was granted. "It was months," said the instructor, "before I ever asked him a question. He came to me one day, asking, in a shamefaced way, if I would some time go out to see what he had tried to do. I went with him. But rather than describe what I found, I wish you would go yourself to see it. When you come back, I will finish the story."

Following directions, I soon came upon a small buildings which proved to be a hothouse. It was filled with thrifty growths for garden and field use in the red soil of the region round about. There were ingenious devices for studying the effect of various soils upon all manner of roots. There were many soil-mixtures in which these experiments were being tried. The mechanical structure inside and out was literally patchwork. Doors, sides, posts, boxes, glass, were from objects that had been broken and thrown to the rubbish-heap. From these piles of waste, the boy had picked his glass, boards, roofing, window-sash, and piping. Empty tomato cans, old pails and abandoned lamps served him for furnace and heating tubes. He had invented cross-section boxes in which he could watch the root-development in his different soil mixtures.

This hothouse was a masterpiece. . . . It had been gathered from rubbish-heaps, growing in the boy's overtime into this strictly artistic result. The forty or fifty thriving specimens in it were his own kind of a book. This sort of spelling, reading and writing neither puzzled nor shamed him. It was his kind of arithmetic. . . . The hothouse was crammed with problems, but it was his delight to solve them

All this, with stark amazement, was the thing I looked upon. Here he had come, day after day, when the tasks were over, striving to justify his tolerated presence in the school. Here he had written his own certificate of fitness to be a learner with others at Tuskegee.

When I returned to the lad's teacher in this department, he was very eager to tell me results. "That boy's work," he said, "is so good that I already use it for purposes of instruction with advanced students."—John Graham Brooks, in "An American Citizen: The Life of William Henry Baldwin, Jr."

Good Manners of Yesterday

These excerpts are from the "Manual of Good Manners" published in 1844 — quoted by Arthur Train (in "Puritan's Progress"):

"Never be squinting and scowling and examining the victuals, to see if you can discover a coal or a speck or a hair; if you find one, take it out decently, and not make a great ado about it.

"Eat what you need before you rise from the table; and not be picking victuals at the table, it denotes a thievish disposition.

Some more: "When you have done eating, clean your plate, knife and fork, lay the bones you have picked in a snug heap by the side of your plate, scrape up your crumbs, and cross your knife and fork on your plate.

"Speak not at table. Laugh not at table; it shows unthankfulness.

"The mouth and teeth should be scoured out once each day with coal dust, which is not only good to cleanse the teeth, but is also an excellent preservative to them."

The rule against pocketing victuals at table recalls a story told by Melba (in "Melodies and Memories") about the great tenor Tamagno. (They used to say that his voice was so powerful that his top C's caused the chandeliers at Covent GGarden actually to rattle.) Tamagno was guest at a formal dinner given to Metropolitan Opera singers at which Melba, Jean de Reske and others including the Italian Ambassador and his wife, were present.

When the time arrived for the women to leave the table, relates Melba, "my eyes were so glued to Tamagno that I hardly realized where I was." (She had previously watched him pop crystallized fruits, almonds, chocolates, etc., into his napkin.) "But in a sort of dream I saw him rise to his feet, take up one of the beautiful bunches of orchids with which the ladies had all been presented, bow gracefully and say to the Ambassadress seated next to him:

"'Will you allow me, signora? It is for my daughter who is ill at the hotel.'

"The poor woman was so astonished," says Melba, "that she could only smile artificially and murmur that of course it was permitted to take them."

Another time Melba and Tamagno were luncheon guests of the noted conductor Mancinelli, at an Italian restaurant in New York. Among the dishes served were veal cutlets 'a la Milanaise.' At the end of the course several cutlets were left over.

"This was too much for Tamagno," chuckles Melba. "Leaning over the table, he said to Mancinelli: 'What are you going to do with those?'

"'Do with them?' replied the bewildered Mancinelli. 'Nothing.'

"'Ah,' Tamagno siged with satisfaction. In his resonant tones he summoned a waiter. 'Give me a newspaper,' he cried.

"The newspaper was brought, and then, with the utmost deliberation, Tamagno proceeded to wrap the cutlets up, one by one in the newspaper. Suddenly pausing, and sensing that an explanation was required, he said: 'You see, my little dog—he loves veal cutlets.'"

The sequel to this story is worthy of note, adds Melba. On the next day Mancinelli called at Tamagno's private suite at about twelve o'clock. He and his daughter were just sitting down to lunch.

"Need I tell you what was the dish in the centre of the table?" asks Melba, mischievously.

London's Vast Docks

London docks, scattered from the city down thirty miles of the Thames River as far as the Tilbury Docks, the nearest port to the sea, include many famous and important structures. Passing through Tower Bridge at London, on the Thames, one approaches first the entrance to the London and St. Katherine Docks with their lofty warehouses.

Large quantities of many of the most valuable commodities from all parts of the world are stored here. More than 60,000,000 fleeces of wool pass through these docks every year. The Port of London Authority keeps a staff of experts to perform such necessary operations as weighing and sampling. Other goods stored on the docks include skins, wines, spices, sugar, rubber, ivory, drugs, coffee, cocoa, iodine, quicksilver essential oils canned fruits, fish and cocoanuts.

The Royal Victoria and Albert and King George V Docks stretch for three miles along the riverside between Blackwall and Gallions Reaches of the River Thames. The King George V entrance lock, the second largest in the port of London, gives a view of the largest sheet of enclosed dock water in the world.

FASHION HINT

"How to make my old short skirts conform to the new length was a problem to me until I hit on this plan. I dropped the hems; and as the part that had been turned under was darker than the rest, I redyed the entire dress, after having bleached the goods, following directions in the Diamond Dyes package.

"I used Diamond Dyes for the redyeing, of course. I have dyed many things with these wonderful colors. They have saved me many dollars and have never failed to give perfect results—smooth, even colors—fast to wear and washing. Friends think my things are new when I redye or tint them with Diamond Dyes. They do give the most gorgeous colors!"

Mrs. G.C., Levis, Quebec.

The Fire Menace in the Dominion

Summer has its perils as well as its pleasures, and one of the greatest perils is the forest fire. Until a few decades ago Canada was careless of her timber wealth; there seemed so much of it that exhaustion was a remote prospect. But prodigality always brings its own punishment; now it is realized that the wooded areas must be cared for, and reforestation has become an established undertaking.

In view of this situation, prevention of forest fires is a subject of prime importance. During 1929 6,000,000 acres of timbered land in the Dominion was burned over, with a total loss of $6,200,000; and this despite an elaborate and efficient preventive organization. Each of the Provincial Governments administering its own forests maintains a fire-protection body which co-operates with owners and lessees for the protection of timbered areas, the cost being distributed or covered by special taxes on such lands.

The aeroplane is established as an important factor in the detection of forest fires, and in this respect Ontario is particularly well equipped. While aircraft have to a large extent supplanted the old canoe, horseback and foot patrol for detection of fires, a large ground staff, with equipment stored at strategic points, always will be necessary for the fighting of larger fires and maintenance of systems of communication.

With the disappearance of winter conditions these flying firemen may be found all over the forests of Northern Ontario. This is a well trained and disciplined force, directed by skilled aviators, and plays a tremendously important part in the protection of the Province's timber wealth.

There is something picturesque and much that is of a hazardous nature about the work of these men who spend the summer in the clouds above the vast forest domain of this Province, watching eagle-eyed for the incipient fire that may mean disastrous material loss and perhaps death in its most terrible form. Their presence in these danger zones, and the conviction that they are animated by a keen sense of duty, justify public confidence that everything possible will be done to prevent the terrible forest conflagrations of former years.—The Mail and Empire (Toronto).

Mrs. Carney (rushing into the living room, panting for breath)—Oh, Walter, I dropped my diamond ring off my finger and I can't find it anywhere.

Mr. Carney (very calmly)—Its all right, Olive, I came across it in my trouser's pocket.

A friend complains about the increasing worries of dressing. "By the time I get my false teeth in place, my arch supports adjusted, my ear phone regulated and my wrist watch strapped on I am usualy exhausted," he confided.

THE DIFFERENCE

It take so many roses—
Such wealth of gorgeous bloom—
So many petals crushed, to make
One breath of faint perfume.
It take so many hours
Of labor and of tears
To give the world a lovely song
That will outlive the years.
But love is something quite apart,
Just one swift kiss can break a heart.

An old offender was found guilty of stealing a horse and received a stiff sentence on account of his previous record. The judge addressed him as folows.

The Judge—It is my intention to sentence you to eight years at least. Now, before sentence is formerly pronounced on you, I shall listen to anything you may have to say on your behalf.

The Old Offender (after waiting a minute or two)—I don't know ez I've got anything to say only this, it strikes me that you folks 'round here are purty toler'ble liberal with other people's time.

Susie—What are you knitting?

Lottie—Something to cheer up the boys.

Susie—Why, you silly thing, the war is over.

Lottie—This is a bathing suit for me, dear.

Rain is something we don't like while we are getting it, and kick like sin when we don't get it. A barking dog is almost as unpopular as one that bites. The chap who takes care of his own credit and collection department is most apt to collect the living that the world owes him. We don't know which makes for the duller evening—a woman telling about the removal of her appendix, or a man telling about his stock market operation. The advantage of one big worry is that it eliminates a multitude of little worries.

Bride—Shall I have your lunch brought up to the deck, sweetheart?

Groom—No, darling; just throw it overboard—it'll save time and trouble.

"Overboard," shrieked the watch. A thousand men and women rushed to the rail to see a woman struggling in the green water.

"Sharks!" screamed the multitude as white flashed darted towards the body below.

For minutes before the rope was lowered, the multitude gazed in wonder, as the viscious would dart up to the body, then turn and dart away.

"They couldn't touch me," the lady said after they had brought her out. "They were all man-eating sharks."

French Morocco Leather Goods

The raw materials used in the manufacture of French morocco leather goods are sheepskins from which the wool is removed at Mazamet and which are dressed at Graulhet and Issoudun, according to the Index to French Production. These skins have an attractive grain and color and are able to withstand the rough handling and hard service met by travelers' bags. Paris is the chief market for these goods.

Sanitary Rules For Aviation in France

Bureau of Public Hygiene Favors Drawing Up a Set of Model Regulations

Discussions on the sanitary control of aerial navigation resulted in the promulgation of several resolutions by the permanent committee of the International Bureau of Public Hygiene at its recent meeting in Paris, says the Paris correspondent of The Journal of the American Medical Association.

"Several countries have regulations on this subject, some of which are rigorous," he continues. "The committee expressed the view that it would be well to present a typical set of regulations that might serve as a model for all countries, in order that uniformity might characterize their administration. A subcommittee was appointed and authorized to appeal for aid to the Commission Internationale de la Navigation Aerienne. The subcommittee concluded that, under present conditions, which are subject to change from day to day, it would be premature to try to establish a set of regulations or even general principles, and that the regulations adopted, such as they are, will necessarily, at the start, be subject to more or less complete revisions.

"The committe emphasized again the danger of patterning regulations of sanitary defense, as affecting aerial traffic, after the regulations governing maritime navigation. The point was stressed that the risk of dissemination of disease by airships is relatively slight, by reason of the class of passengers and the conditions existing in the landing ports.

"It decided, therefore, that the International Bureau of Public Hygiene, in advising the governments and the organizations interested of the conclusions reached with reference to the question of international sanitary regulation of aerial navigation, should call their attention to the principles adopted by the committee at its session last May; that is to say, (a) established landing fields; (b) medical examination on arrival; (c) sanitary 'surveillance' of persons coming from infected regions; (d) in special and exceptional cases rendering such measures necessary, strict isolation during the port calls.

"To these it would be well to add two others: 1. The buildings, the occupants, and in general, the whole area of the airports, should be maintained in an absolutely sanitary condition, and the precautions, in the yellow fever regions, should include mosquito proofing and measures for the destruction of mosquitos. 2. Wherever the need is felt, special arrangements should be made for the creation of a system of communication between the physicians of the airports located on the same route concerning infectious diseases. It should be emphasized that these recommendations do not include the institution of a system of clearance papers such as is employed in maritime navigation; nor do they provide for the 'observation' of passengers.

"In this connection, in recent research, Pettit, Stefanopoulo and Roubaud showed that the Algerian monkey is highly susceptible to yellow fever. They ascertained that the species of Stegomyia in regions exempt from yellow fever are just as capable of transmitting the virus as are the species of Stegomyia found in endemic regions. Particularly, the species of Stegomyia found in Northern Africa is capable of being the vector of the virus. These facts are important for hygienists to know at this time, when airships may transport a yellow fever patient who is still infectious to a country as yet exempt."

Paris Wears Gem Buttons As Distinctive Trimming

Paris.—Buttons have become part of the fashion world in Paris—the buttons set with jewels are of real value. Jewel buttons form a large part of the decoration on dresses, suits and coats shown by dressmaking designers of the French capital, in their advance collections of Spring clothes.

More often than not, these new bangles serve as brooches rather than as the utilitarian button. Their button form makes them more satisfactory as well-designed decorations for the new dresses—once sewed in place, they are always in correct position, yet a few gestures will detach them from any frock.

Jeweled buttons set with gem-cut stones (that is, those that glisten with reflected light by means of several facets) are being used by many dress designers to replace the usual light spot of pique or linen near the neckline. One particularly original costume is with five gemmed buttons across the front of a high, square neckline.

A Presentation

A very enjoyable evening was spent at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Orton Deeks, Wednesday evening, May 6th, when about seventy five of their neighbors and friends gathered together to bid farewell before leaving for their new home in Aultsville, Ont., where Mr. Deeks has secured a new Service Station.

The early part of the evening was taken up by a short programme. Opening number which was a hymn sung by all, "Blest be the Tie," talk by Mr. Nemiah Summers, instrumental by Mr. Luther Crowder, solo by Mrs. Ellsworth Summers, reading by Miss Norma Summers, instrumental by Mr. Luther Crowder, trio by Mrs. Donald Strader, Mr. Bishop Coons and Mr. John Carkner, entitled "My Mother's Bible". Mr. and Mrs. Deeks were then called forward when an address was read by Mrs. Frank Hunter, and presented with an Electric Iron and Serving Tray.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Deeks and family—We, your neighbors and friends, knowing that you are shortly to leave us, could not let the occasion pass without expressing to you our regret at your departure from among us, and at the same time assure you that our very best wishes go with you as you go to your new home.

During the years that you have been with us, we have learned to esteem you very highly, as friends and neighbours. Your readiness to render whatever assistance you could at any hour in times of difficulty or sorrow, has always marked your stay among us and has been greatly appreciated. We feel we are losing kind friends and a good neighbour, but we are confident that in your new home the same splendid qualities which have been the admiration of all in the community will soon manifest themselves in your new sphere of activity and win for you there many more warm friends.

As a small token of our esteem and a slight remembrance of your sojourn among us, we ask you to accept these tokens of our regard, and linked with it is the hope that you may all enjoy good health, and that under the guidance of our Heavenly Father real success may attend all your undertakings.

Signed in behalf of the Community, Mr. and Mrs. Gann Christie, Mr. and Mrs. Rowat Hunter.

Mr. Deeks responded in a few well chosen words, thanking the people for their kind appreciation. Lunch was then served and the evening came to a close by all singing, "For he is a jolly good fellow."

Mrs. John Pickering, Riceville

Mrs. Pickering, who passed away at Riceville in Prescott County on Thurs. May 7th, will be better known to many people by her maiden name, Maggie Beattie. Her parents were Mr. and Mrs. Robert Beattie, who lived near Lakefield Que., at the time of her birth nearly 78 years ago. A few years ago they moved to Ontario, and settled on a farm near Chesterville, owned at present by Mr. Geo Beattie. Here the late Mrs. Pickering grew to young womanhood and married about fifty-five years ago, going then to live at Riceville. Forty-four years ago she was left a widow with four small children, all of whom grew up to manhood and womanhood. A few years ago the two eldest boys, James and Wilburn passed away. These had been Recording Stewart and Sunday School Supt., respectively of the Riceville Church.

The two surviving children are: Mrs. Mildred Franklin, who tenderly cared for her mother in her declining years, and Mr. Robert Pickering, B A., a teacher in the commercial School at Hamilton, which position he has filled for nine years.

On Saturday afternoon the last tribute of respect was paid the deceased when a large number attended her funeral service held in Riceville United Church and conducted by her pastor, Rev. A. Gaukrodger, who spoke these words of Paul, "This mortal shall put on immortality." Reference was made to the contribution made to the community by Mrs. Pickering through her family. A duet was sung entitled, "Beautiful Hands, Beckoning Hands." The choir sang, "Face to Face." Among other floral tributes there was a Wreath from the staff of Hamilton Technical School. Interment was made in the cemetery at Franklin's Corners.

Mrs. Pickering is also survived by two brothers, Mr. D. Beattie of Winchester and Mr. Robt. Beattie of Toronto, also two sisters: Mrs. Marlin of Sawyerville, Que. and Mrs. McConnell of Vancouver.

Among those attending her funeral from a distance were: Mrs. Lawrence Walker, Mrs. Edgar Summers, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Earle and Mr. D. Beattie of Winchester, and Mr. and Mrs. A. B. McConnell, Mr. Wm. McConnell, and Mrs. J. W. Smith of Morewood.

Pleasing Event at Ormond

The May meeting of the Mission Circle when 28 met at the very hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. P. A. McDonald. The meeting was conducted by Mrs. Hubert Carkner, and the topic was very ably taken by Mrs. J. E. Docksteader on the life of the late Rev. G. McFaul. At the close of the devotional and business part an interesting event took place when a beautiful Bible and a Book of Psalms was presented to Miss Jessie Carkner, one of our former members. The address was read by the president, Mrs. J. Cumming and the presentation made by the Vice President, Mrs J. E. Docksteader after which a very dainty lunch was served and a social time spent together, all departing after a most pleasant and profitable afternoon, voting Mrs. McDonald and her daughter, Miss Etta, most congenial hostesses, and wishing such events might occur oftener. Following is the address.

Ormond, May 7th, 1931.

Dear Miss Carkner:—As we have met on this, the 25th Anniversary of the organization of our Mission Circle, it is with feelings of regret that we realize that you, though with us to day are with us, the guest not as on former occasions, as an active member of our Circle. You and your fore fathers, have for many years been intimately associated with our church and community life in its various activities. We shall miss you because you are one of the links between the past and present in our church life, links which are gradually becoming less with the passing of the years. We cannot express our feelings better than by the words of the poet when he says.

"When we asunder part, it gives us inward pain,
But we shall still be joined in heart,
And hope to meet again."

We therefore ask of you to accept of these small tokens of our regard for you, knowing that as you daily read from the "Book of Books" you will remember the friends of your childhood home.

On behalf of the Ormond Mission Circle: Mrs. J. Cumming, President, and Mrs. J. E. Docksteader, Vice President.

Fire at Chesterville

Mrs. John Murphy, Chesterville, had a narrow escape of being burned to death on Thursday morning last week. As it was she had to be rescued from the burning building by her son Angus, assisted by R. Curren, who took her out and to safety through an upper window and the assistance of a ladder. Her nephew, R. Curren was returning home from a dance about 3.30 in the morning, and on entering the house found it full of smoke. He sounded the alarm, and was able to rescue Mrs. Murphy in the manner stated. The house was a total loss, but it is partly covered by insurance.

Reception At Ormond

On Friday night last, about 200 friends and neighbors invaded the newly formed home of Mr. and Mrs. John Reoch, at Ormond, to tender them congratulations and good wishes on their recent marriage. The young couple were taken completely by surprise. After John and his young bride were comfortably seated in two big easy chairs, Mrs. Hubert Carkner proceeded to read the following address:

Dear Lois and John—We are pleased to be able to come together on such a happy occasion as this to extend to you our heartiest congratulations and good wishes for a long and happy voyage on the sea of matrimony.

You have both lived here among us all your lives and we well know your sterling characters. We are sincerely glad that you are not leaving us now that you have joined the ranks of the married.

You, Lois, who have served the community for so long behind the counter of Ormond Store, have ever proved yourself good natured, tactful and obliging. We know that you will be just as efficient as a housewife and that your talents will not be wasted in your new venture.

John, you have shown yourself to be a good friend and neighbor to all with whom you have come in contact, and it is our belief that you have chosen a worthy partner.

We hope that both of you will live long and happy lives and that nothing but good fortune will come your way. We now ask you to accept these gifts as an indication of our esteem.

Signed on behalf of the community, L. MacDonald.

The young couple were presented with a Library Table and Chair and several other gifts. Both Mr. and Mrs. Reoch made suitable replys, inviting their many friends to visit them often in their new home. The balance of the evening was spent in games, music, etc., after which a dainty luncheon was served. Before leaving, all joined in singing "Blest be the Tie that Binds."

Herbert Mahlon Beach, a well known resident of Ottawa and the Ottawa district, died last Friday, after a long illness. Mr. Beach had never fully recovered from a severe attack of pneumonia he suffered a year ago. He was 65 years of age.

A son of the late Mr. and Mrs Asa Beach, he was born at Chesterville, but had lived in Ottawa since 1895. Years ago he had mining interests in British Columbia, but latterly he had been associated with Beach Motors, Limited.

He was a member of the United Church and Lodge of Fidelity, A. F. and A. M Of genial disposition, he made friends easily and will be greatly missed. In his work at the Beach Motors building, he met a large section of the motoring public who will learn with regret of his passing.

United Church Mother's Day Service

The programme planned by the O. R. E. C. was carried out on Sunday morning with Mr. J. D. Stewart, the S. S. Sup't presiding An interesting story about the importance of doing little things well was told by Mrs. Waddell, who held the attention of the boys and girls.

A Pageant, "Noble Mothers of Famous Men," was well acted out under the direction of Mrs. W. J. Cass. The leading part was taken by Mrs. P. S. Durant, who was assisted by Mabel Waddell, who told the story of John Wesley's mother; Audrey Scott, Lincoln; Ernest Helmer who spoke on Lord Haldane and his mother; and Gordon Lannin, who told of Booker T. Washington and what his mother had done for him. Master Donald Adams opened the door for the attendants. Rev. J. A. Waddell added a few appropriate words urging young folks to always remember to write to their mothers and to be ever thoughtful to them while they are living, and if mother has gone on to higher service to make their lives worthy of her high example.

HENRY'S SHORTHAND SCHOOL

Ottawa, Ontario

No school in Canada offers a better training, or ensures a more successful future. Henry's leads all others, and ranks among employers as "THE SCHOOL OF HIGHER EFFICIENCY"—a fact borne out by more than 600 pupils who have, since January, 1913, left other Ottawa Schools to come to it.

Therefore, it is not surprising that business men, in advertising for stenographers should specially say, "Graduates of Henry's School preferred."
