THE MORRISBURG LEADER

VOL. 94, NO. 18. MORRISBURG, ONTARIO, FRIDAY, MAY 4th, 1956 SINGLE COPIES 5c

Ontario Hydro showed two plans on Tuesday night for what they termed a "Town Hall", at a joint meeting of the Planning Board and the Municipal Council. While the plans met favour with many at the meeting,, some disapproval was expressed that they did not include a public meeting place of an appreciable size, as had been requested in previous meetings between the Hydro and the Municipality.

Two designs were shown by Hydro Architect Ken. Candy, a modern colonial and o modern design. The interior of both was the same, but the architect explained some thought had to be given to the shopping centre, which would not be too far distant.

The building would be of brick, one story high, wiwth a total area of 7,550 square feet. There would be two intersecting corridors, and the main entrance would face the south on th extension of Fiifth Street, and also face the two new schools. A courtroom and council hamber, 20 x 35 fett, would be at the front left side of the entrance. A library, also 20 x 35 feet, would be on the right. The clerk's office would be at the rear of the Council Chambers and police offices across the corridor from this. A fire hall, 16 feet by 25 feet, would be at the rear. Connected with the main building would be another, with a police garage and a works department space. The heating unit would be in tthe basement of the Fire Hall.

It was decided to put the plans on display for a few days before the final decision is made.

At an earlire meeting of the Planning Board, approval was given to a request by Mark Salmon that the new water tower, north of the new No. 2 Highway on the east side of Augustus Street, be moved about 200 feet north. Mr. Salmon explained that in the new position it would interfere less in the development of land in which he is interested.

Recently in the firs free-time television political telecast, Finance Minister Harris was interviewed by a person who was popularly thought to be a typical Canadian citizen, intreviewing a public servant on the income tax situation. It was later revealed that the interviewer was a paid employee of a Liberal organizat ion. In other words, he was directly or indirectly, if not an actual employee, at least a supporter of Mr. Harris. Could anyone suppose that his questions would be objective, or that he would ask any questions that might be embarrassing to Mr. Harris, or that the interview would be of any value to the average Canadian citizen? How much different the questions might have been had they been asked, say, by Donald MacDonald, of the CCF or John Diefenbaker of the Progressive Conservative Party. The CBC, like the Ontario Hydro, the Ontario Board of Review, etc., are creatures of the Government in power, and can only reflect the views of that Government.

The difference with who you are, and with whom you are dealing in the transfer of farm property is dramatically illustrated in last week end's announcement from Toronto, that former Premier George S. Henry (those who remember back to 1934 will remember that he "plowed a straight furrow"), had sold his farm of 250 acres to an independent construction company for two million dollars. That represents some $8,000.00 per acre. Mr. Henry is also to retain his home on the farm. This compensation is certainly a far cry from what is being offered in Seaway Valley, although we have been constantly assured that the Valley is the future industrial Cradle of Canada. A more realistic approach to evaluations for the farms to be taken by the Hydro and the Seaway Authority, is indicated.

The next heavyweight boxing champion of the world may well be a Canadian. James J. Parker, of Barrie, on April 29th, knocked out Heinz Neuhaus, European Champion in the third round of a scheduled 10-round bout. Since the retirement last week of Champion Rocky Marciano, there has been lot of speculation as to who should succeed him. James J. Parker will certainly be a contender for the title. Another Canadian, who has officially retired, but who might be easily lured out of retirement by the magic dollar formula, is Earl Walls, Toronto Negro, who showed much promise in his brief professional career.

When is a town hall not a town hall? The answer to that one is easy. All one has to do is to look at the proposed town hall to be provided for Morrisburg. (The plans can be seen in Bradfield's window. These plans were presented by Mr. Ken Candy of Ontario Hydro at a meeting on Wednesday night. They are fine; no doubt Mr. Candy spent considerable time on these plans, and they are admirably suited to the town of Morrisburg (with one exception): — The plans contain no provision for any kind of auditorium, or public meeting place. We do not profess to know how this can be arranged, but the need is elementary for this town. We hope that the Council and Planning Board can arrange with Ontario Hydro tot make provision for such a meeting place in any community centre. In the meantime citizens are urged to study the plan presently on display in Bradfield's window. It may be that the citizens of Morrisburg are satisfied with this half-measure offered by the Hydro Commission. Speaking on bemalf of at least a few of the ratepayers, we are not satisfied. But unless tre citizens make known their wishes to their representatives on the Council and the Planning Board, the presentation by Hydro is likely to be accepted. The choice is yours. If you want a town hall, which can be dignified by that name, call one of your representatives today. Here are their names and telephone numbers: Morrisburg Council: Reeve George E. Beavers, phones 23w, 23j, 20; Councillors: Harry Duval, 15, 109; J. A. Edgerton 240, 184; M. A. Wilson, 400, 504; A. W. Guay, 218.

One of the delightful features of small cakes and cookies is their versatility. The young people away love to receive them from the home folks. They're indispensable for picnics, and great stand-bys for after-school snacks and for whipped-up-in-a-hurry suppers. They're equally at home at elaborate teas and in the good old-fashioned cooky jar.

In some households, lunches for school or shop are packed everyday. Small cakes and cookies fit neatly and appetizingly into lunch boxes.

Don't Disdain The Lowly Catfish

Is your pulse rapid, your throat dry? Do you find yourself staring vacantly out the window? Do you spend your lunch hour mooning in front of fishing tackle displays? If so, brother, you have a severe case of piscalitis, or fishing fever, a mysterious malady that attacks males from 5 to 90 annually at this season.

It is rarely fatal, but its thousands of victims suffer intensely from the onset of the disease in March until trout season opens sometime between the middle of April and the first of May. Fortunately, there is a remedy! The treatment consists of liberal doses of pond fishing for bluegills, crappies, perch, catfish and other varieties of game and panfish frequently neglected at this season in favor of the aristocratic trout.

Early spring is a good fishing season. Added to the wolfish hunger of the fish is the post-winter shortage of natural feed to compete with the angler's offerings. The new crop of small forage fish has not yet hatched, and frogs and insects are still absent, so that any object which looks even remotely edible is sure to be investigated by a hungry fish.

How do you tell when the fish have thrown off their winter drowsiness and are ready to come out fighting. Some say: "Watch first forsythias bloom!" They claim that you can fish from ice-out on, but won't really start doing business until the first forsythia bloom.

An old angler of my acquaintance had a more occult method. On a soft March day after the ice had gone, and the first robin had come, the old gent would sniff the spring air.

"I smell bullheads," he would proclaim with solemn certainty, and, sure enough, that very night the horned pout would begin biting in the millpond.

And for my money those first pout of the season, taken from the icy waters of springtime, are the best pout of all. They're real scrappers, too, at this time of year, and if you fish for them with a four-ounce flyrod, you'll know you've been in a rhubard before old ameirus comes thrashing over the gunwale. And the same goes for his rambunctious relative, the scrappy channel cat. It had better be an old flyrod, though, for these critters' tactics are apt to put a corkscrew in the finest bamboo after a few nights' use, writes Ted Janes in The Police Gazette.

Occasionally you can take channel cats on artificial lures, but both the horned pout and his larger cousin are best caught with bait, as are the blue, yellow and other catfish. It doesn't matter what the bait is so long as it's the right size for a catfish's ample maw. Shiners, worms, clams, hamburger, kernels of corn and pieces of other fish are all okay. Dough baits have long been popular. These are usually compounded of wheat flour and corn meal well laced with time-ripened flavoring, such as cheese, molasses, vanilla, clam juice and even bourbon.

Coagulated blood mixed with limburger cheese is another potent attractor, as are nightcrawlers, reliable as any bait for all breeds of catfish.

Put on a sinker and let the bait rest on the bottom with just enough tension so that you can feel a bite when it comes. It won't be long before the slow tap, tap, tap of an exploring catfish vibrates through the rod. Let him have the bait for a few seconds and then set the hook smartly.

Natural baits, such as worms or small shiners are also traditional in fishing for bluegills, crappies, perch and other panfish, but you've got to use light tackle if you want any fun out of it, for the scrappy little pan species can put up a rampage comparable to that of a trout.

If you like, you can troll, especially for perch and crappies, and you'll get some of the fastest action of all. At this time of year deep trolling is the secret of success. Get your bait riding along the bottom and troll slowly.

One day on a Cape Cod pond a friend and I trolled small mummychubs for big yellow perch. The methods which paid off in summer were no good in spring, but we kept on experimenting with different rigs. It was only when we got the bait down to the bottom with a sinker that we began to get results.

Natural bait is good, but artificial lures are effective for panfish and offer more fun and wider opportunities to the angler. Besides, they give the fisherman his first chance to try out some of his Christmas tackle and to sharpen up his techniques.

Small spoons, spinners and spinning lures — the same ones you will use for trout — are all good medicine for bluegills, crappies and perch. They can be cast from shore or boat, or they can be trolled with equal ease and effectiveness.

Each year about the time the first hylas began to peep, I used to go to a nearby millpond and cast a spinner and fly combination for yellow perch. I'd cast as far out from shore as I could and let the lure sink to the bottom. Then I'd retrieve it slowly with short twitches of the rod, keeping the lure deep. I seldom came home without an eatin' string of perch.

Incidentally, the spinner and fly combination, good for most panfish, is one of the best of all artificial lures for perch and crappies. Pearl, gold or nickel are good colors for the spinner, and the flies should be gaudy—red, orange, blue, yellow or green.

The many new spinning lures along with a spinning rod are almost unbeatable for spring panfishing. The rod is ideal, for it will put a lure where you want it, and its lithe springiness enables even a small panfish to put up a creditable battle. You can get more practice out of your spinning outfit on the panfish ponds in spring than you can in an entire season on the trout streams.

Duke Ellington Discusses Jazz

Duke Ellington genially attacked "romantic stories" about jazz even though, he said, "I've cashed in on a lot of them." He was talking in Boston, where, among other things, he was invited to become an honorary member of a national music fraternity, Kappa Gamma Psi.

He told how someone in the twenties had started a story that "Ellington never writes music on paper," a story that has been perpetuated in various degrees ever since. With onomatopoetic humor, he described how he was supposed to convey to his musicians what he wanted them to play. Let the romantics now be advised: Duke Ellington writes music on paper.

In fact he challenges the whole hazy idea that jazz is the impromptu expression of an untutored people. He recalled the story of "The Boy and the Black Stick" in roughly this fashion: "There's this little illiterate boy, you see, ragged as a can of spaghetti, and he's walking along through the grass, and he finds a black stick. Well, you and I know it's a clarinet, but to him it's a black stick. So he sits under a tree and blows on the end of the stick and out comes music. (Mr Ellington paused momentarily, possibly for an imaginary dramatic chord.) And that's jazz!"

Mr. Ellington laughs at the story, but he feels it illustrates a widespread mistaken notion about jazz. "I don't believe a man plays the blues because he has the blues," he said. "It's like any art—sculpture, for instance. A sculptor can carve a figure of a crying woman without being a crying woman."

Thus Mr. Ellington suggested that jazz may be more conscious and less spontaneous than "romantic stories" would suggest. "You have to have some kind of arrangement," he said, "if you have more than two people playing." At the moment he has a 16-piece band.

Jazz isn't just improvisation, Mr. Ellington said. In the first place, it takes five or 10 years for a musician to learn his instrument, whether he studies formally or on his own. Where the conservatory student might work on exercise sheets, the would-be jazz player listens to recordings. Instead of scales he learns other players' bits of invention, and when he becomes professional he has these "licks" to draw on for his improvising.

At least this is the way it used to be. Mr. Ellington told of his own early days as a pianist in Washington, D.C. "You had to get yourself a cat to answer your questions," he said. "When a man finds out what he wants to learn, that's the beginning of education." (Like most musicians, Mr. Ellington rarely uses in ordinary conversation the "jive talk" that jazz men are supposed to favor. The word "cat" was an exception. It is an all-purpose term, usually with a favorable connotation; here it probably meant simply "musician.")

In jazz today, Mr. Ellington continued, "you need everything you can get. You need the conservatory—with an ear to what's happening in the street."

The latter phrase turned out to have a specific reference in Mr. Ellington's case, as he described his approach to composing. "I tried to write what I I heard people whistling in the street," he said.

Was this a kind of folk music? "They might have heard it from an old person," he said, "but it was just whistling to be whistling. People used to do a lot of walking, and they'd whistle. You'd ask someone, 'What is that you're whistling?' and he'd say—nothin'!"

It was more fun composing in the early days, said Mr. Ellington, whose career goes back to the time when jazz was establishing its traditions. There were great players, he said, but "some were rather limited." He recalled a trombone player who had "only six good notes." Mr. Ellington's problem was to use those six notes to advantage.

It has long been observed by critics that Mr. Ellington's works seem to have been done with particular musicians in mind. Though some jazz purists insist that no orchestrated music is jazz, a case has often been made for Mr. Ellington's orchestrated music on the ground that when it is performed by musicians attuned to it, it becomes jazz.

Mr. Ellington doesn't care what you call it. In fact he would just as soon remove the word "jazz" and its various categories from the language. "It drives people away," he said. "I don't see a necessity for it."

As for bop, cool jazz, and progressive jazz, Mr. Ellington said: "There are no new melodies, no new harmonies. It's all a matter of perspective — and publicity, I think. Categories are unnecessary. If it sounds good, it sounds good."

Assuming there is such a thing as jazz, Mr. Ellington made a seldom-heard claim for the East as a pioneering area. He said that there was an eastern movement independent from the New Orleans origins, and it involved particularly string players and "two-fisted pianists." They had extremely individual styles, they were sophisticated, and they had excellent taste, he said.

One of the pianists could "only play in F-sharp, but man —!" The sentence broke off in silent admiration. "F-sharp's a wonderful key."

In Boston Mr. Ellington took time to encourage a young pianist who can play in more than one key. She is Toshiko Akiyoshi, whose story illustrates the way jazz is crossing and recrossing boundaries these days. She has come from Tokyo on a scholarship to increase her technical knowledge of music, so that she can return better equipped to further jazz in Japan. Already she has called forth praise from American jazz enthusiasts.

Some members of Mr. Ellington's current band started with him in the twenies. The group is on a tour that will eventually take it to Colgate University, the University of Virginia, the University of North Carolina and the University of Mississippi.

The band was playing in Alabama during the Autherine Lucy situation, Mr. Ellington pointed out, and he was asked by a school reporter if he was "going to do anything about it." Mr. Elligton said that he replied, "If our performance commands respect, I think that's a major contribution."

"They're getting desperate!"

THE FARM FRONT

by John Russell

When Will Barrie of Galt, Ont. went to Sweden as manager of the 1955 Canadian plowing team, he took a good look around. What he saw impressed him. Here's his report on their farms, forests, diets, way of life, and their beautiful women, as reported in The Imperial Oil Review.

I suppose every nation believes — or likes to believe — that its women are the most beautiful on earth.

Had anybody asked me a year ago, I would have said, quite honestly, that I thought Canada had the best-looking women. But I'm going right out on a limb and say that the most attractive women I've ever seen, as a national group, are not Canadians, but Swedish girls. It's a conclusion I came to after spending two weeks in Sweden last fall.

Any friends reading this will probably be wondering, "What's this got to do with the price of wheat?" They know I'm a farmer, not a playboy, and that I went to Sweden last October, not as a movie talent scout, but as manager of the 1955 Canadian plowing team. (Our boys, by the way, did very well in the competition for the Esso Golden Plow, at the World Plowing Match. Ivan McLaughlin of Stouffville, Ont., came second and Joe Tran of Claremont, Ont., was fourth, out of 24 plowmen from 12 countries.) And our friends on the Canadian Council of Plowing Associations, which sent us overseas, and at Imperial Oil, which provided our passage, understood that the tour we made of Sweden after the match was to enlighten us about Swedish farming methods — not about Swedish beauties.

Well, we did concentrate on farming — believe me! — and the only reason I bring up this question of feminine loveliness is that it helps me explain my most vivid impression of Swedish farming. This impression became firm in my mind (after a conversation with some local residents) when we visiting plowmen and managers stopped not far from the home of a girl named Hillevi Rombin. Her name may not mean much to you, but perhaps it will when I add that she is Miss Universe of 1955. We didn't see her ourselves, for she was in the United States at the time; but we did meet some people who knew her well. One of them remarked that Miss Rombin was a charming and wholesome girl from a very fine family. Then he said something that I thought was far more remarkable. "She's very pretty," he said, "but we never considered her any better-looking than the rest of the girls around here."

This remark was not intended to disparage Miss Rombin in any way; it was a simple and honest observation. I feel sure he would have said the same thing about such famous Swedish beauties as Garbo, Bergman and Anita Ekberg. Right then I began to realize that the Swedes make a regular habit of achieving near-perfection — and then taking it for granted. Fortunately I don't have to rely on anything as intangible as feminine charm to prove this over-all impression of mine. The best proof was what I saw of Swedish farming methods. And what is true of the farm folk is probably true of the majority of the population for about one-quarter of Sweden's 7,200,000 citizens live on farms.

The ability to achieve near-perfection is evident everywhere. You can see it in the forests which cover well over a third of most farms. Here in Canada we have talked for years about tree conservation but are just getting around to converting our words into actions. In Sweden, forest conservation practices, such as selective cutting and methodical replanting, were started at least a century ago and are now standard procedure in every forest, whether owned by a farmer, a lumber company, or the government. No Swedish farmer, I was told, would dream of cutting a tree without consulting a government forester beforehand. The result is that the Swedes are decades ahead of us in reforestation. Both Canada and Sweden cut a lot of timber every year, but our forests are dwindling while theirs are increasing in size. Furthermore, the Swedish farmer usually gets far more rain than he wants, so he does not have the incentive we do to plant trees for water conservation.

To be perfectly fair, I must mention that their forest floors are covered with a natural moss that undoubtedly helps to prevent fires, so they don't suffer the timber losses we do each summer. But that's all the more reason why we should be doing more to conserve what we can.

I was even more amazed when I saw what happens when the same philosophy is applied to crop farming. Here in Ontario, a man who gets 60 bushels of wheat to the acre is a really good farmer. The average wheat yield in my own Waterloo county, according to the last figures I saw, was 35.1 bushels to the acre. In Sweden I met farmers who produce as much as 70 bushels of wheat to the acre, and the last published figures show that Sweden's wheat production, per acre, is about 60 per cent higher than Canada's. (With yields like this, the only reason their total productivity is not as high as ours is that the country is so small; for every acre they have been able to cultivate, we have 38 acres of farm land or potential farm land.)

What's the secret? I knew there must be one, because nobody gets crops like that year after year, just by luck or accident. I found the Swedish farmer uses tremendous quantities of fertilier. For a grain crop on which we would use perhaps 200 or 300 pounds of fertilizer per acre, the Swedish farmer will use up to 2,000 pounds — 1,500 in the fall and another 500 in the spring. I need hardly add that the extra yield more than covers the cost of the extra fertilizer.

I don't know of a farm in Canada with land that could utilize anything near 2,000 pounds of fertilizer per acre. Does that mean that the Swedish farmer happens to be lucky? Not at all. The reason he can use such quantities of fertilizer is that he and his forefathers have been conditioning their lands to it for generations.

There's nothing we Canadian farmers could do that would enable us to get our lands into this condition this year, next year or even five years from now. But unless we make sure now that we are planting the right things in the right soil, are rotating our crops properly and are doing everything else possible to improve our soil conditions, even our great-grandchildren won't be able to do as well as Swedish farmers are doing now.

Another secret of the agricultural success in Sweden is their system of testing stations, where samples of soil and produce are analyzed. I doubt if there's a farmer anywhere in Canada who has to be sold on the advantages of scientific testing, but here again I found the Swedes have set us a good example. Our testing stations are just as good as theirs but they have a lot more of them — about 200 in a country half the size of Ontario. Thus the great majority of farmers find it easy to get scientific guidance in every phase of their work. My own farm happens to be within easy driving distance of the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph, Ont., and I use its testing services quite often. But I know there are some farmers in Canada who haven't a testing station within 200 miles, and no doubt their farming suffers as a result.

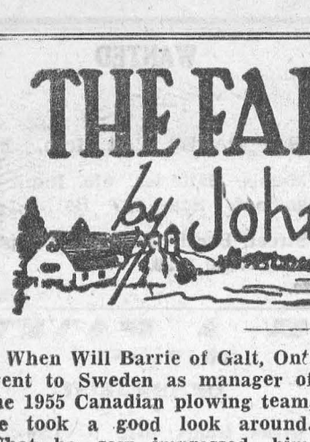
You could argue that there's little point in increasing our yields in some crops, such as wheat, if we can't sell what we are already producing. But conservation projects take a long time — sometimes a lifetime or longer — before they begin to pay off. I can't see any justification for robbing our descendants of good lands just because we have marketing problems.

The Swedish farmer is in the happy position of being able to sell, quite readily, almost everything he can produce. Part of this is due to luck, but planning has something to do with it too. The luck lies in the fact that the population of Sweden is just about right in proportion to the amount of food that can be produced on the land, and since the country is physically small compared to Canada, the Swedes haven't costly transportation problems. The planning that helps him takes the form of co-operatives. I'm certainly not sold on all forms of co-ops. In fact, I'm convinced that co-op stores, as we saw them in Britain, are not in the best interests of the general public, for what is everybody's business soon becomes nobody's business, and everybody suffers, especially the customer.

The Swedish co-ops were not stores, but co-ops run by producers and it was an eye-opener to see and hear how the Swedish farmer uses them to market his goods and maintain fair prices. Co-ops also come into the picture often at the processing stage, too, with the farmer using co-operatively-owned plants that would be too expensive for him to own alone. That's the case sometimes, for example, with the big drying plants where they must reduce the moisture content of their grains before they can be stored safely.

I wish I could say at this point that our post-war trend toward mechanization has put us far ahead of the Swedish farmers in this respect; but it just isn't so. Granted, they have fewer pieces of equipment per farm, but their farms are small, even by Ontario standards, with an average of 80 acres, and 50 of these in forest. From what I saw, I'd say they were just as well mechanized as ours. However, several Swedes told me they thought Canada produced the best combines in the world, and I noticed them using many of the makes of tractors that are so familiar to us.



GROWRROARRR — This gent is convincing, whether it's a comment on politics, baseball or somebody's wedding. Leo Feline, above, demonstrates the form that brought him the Debate Championship at the London Zoo. Against that armored trap, who can argue?

FOR WATCHING DRY PROGRAMS? — Camel saddles have supplied a welcome oasis in a financial desert for Razouk Malik, 26, above, Lebanese student at Southern Illinois University. Shipped here from dollar-short Lebanon by his father as a means of supplying the boy with funds, the sheepskin-covered hardwood saddles are finding a ready market for use as TV viewing stools.

EMPLOYMENT PROBLEM

A street-corner Salvation Army meeting had attracted a small group of spectators, and after the playing of a few hymns, the captain approached a young hepcat in the audience. She placed her hand on his shoulder and asked: "Wouldn't you like to work for the Lord?"

Smiling bashfully, the hepcat replied: "No thanks, I already got a job."

TOP DOG—Lassie has proved to be on of TV's leading actors. The canine star poses in New York after having won a George Foster Peabody award for distinguished achievement on television during 1955. The show was picked as best youth and children's program.

SPELLING BEE

The fact that Shoeless Joe Jackson couldn't read or white became common knowledge very quickly. One day when the White Sox were playing the Indians, a Cleveland rooter got "on" Shoeless Joe. Every time Jackson came to bat, the "jockey" would yell, "Hey, Shoeless Joe, how do you spell illiterate?"

In the top of the ninth, Jackson came up with the score tied and a runner on first. Again the nuisance screamed, "Hey, Shoeless Joe, how do you spell illiterate?"

Jackson promptly belted one off the right-center fence for a triple, bringing in the tie-breaking tally. Standing on third base, he turned toward his tormentor and shouted, "Hey, big mouth, how do you spell triple?"

Brand New

Even people who have just moved into a brand new house can have a good garden and have it this season too. Even those who rent and move every few years can also have an excellent showing. In these cases, of course, we rely on annual flowers rather than perennials which must get established. And, it is amazing what can be done with annuals exclusively. We can get vines that will cover a porch in a matter of weeks, things like scarlet runner beans, the modern and vastly improved morning glories. Or we can use window boxes filled with trailing nasturtiums, and semi-trailing petunias, marigolds and zinnias.

For big screens, to act as hedges there are all sorts of rapid growing bushy annuals like cosmos, African marigolds, spider plants, larkspur, hibiscus, malope and others that are listed in any Canadian seed catalogue. These quick growers reach two to four feet and will take the place of shrubbery and give privacy as well as abundance of bloom. As for the regular beds, there are hundreds of annuals from which to choose.

Where we have just moved in we can combine special annuals with the permanent perennials which will eventually take their place. In amongst the tiny new shrubs, climbers, and trees, we plant liberally with big annuals and we continue to do this for the first few years until the permanent stuff has got established and requires the full room.

Can't Buy This Quality

We all know the old argument about it being cheaper to buy vegetables than for the urban man to grow them. That is all very well but it overlooks an important point. No matter how handy the store and how fast the transportation, it just isn't possible to buy the sort of freshness that only comes with vegetables grown in one's own garden. A little plot where we have a few feet of lettuce, onions, radish, carrots and perhaps a row of beans, tomatoes, or corn, will repay itself many times over just in freshness alone.

Not a great deal of room will be necessary. To make it go further there are various ways of growing two crops, or practically so, on the same piece of land. Of course in this intensive sort of vegetable gardening, extra fertilizer is essential and the soil must be well worked and rich. In double cropping, we alternate rows of an early kind with a later one, for instance radish and carrots, or lettuce and beans, or peas and corn. We also have less space than normal between the rows, if necessary no more than 12 or 15 inches. The early stuff, of course, comes on quickly and is used up before the later maturing vegetables require full room. Another practice is to follow the harvesting of the first vegetables like the peas, lettuce, spinach, radish, early onions, etc., with another sowing of the same or something else that will be ready say in August or September. Then there are certain crops like squash, pumpkins, that we can plant in the outside rows and we can have staked tomatoes along the end of any vegetable row and cucumbers along the fence.

Don't Bury Them

Almost every one is inclined to plant far too deeply. With tiny seed such as that of lettuce, carrots, cosmos, zinnias, poppies, and alyssum, which are not much larger than the head of a pin or shingle nail, it is not necessary to cover at all. We sow these in the finest soil and merely press in. Then, if possible, we keep the soil dampened until germination starts. With larger seeds such as nasturtiums, peas, beans and corn, one should cover lightly, say a quarter to half inch. With bulbs or corms of gladiolus, dahlias, or potatoes, one plants four to eight inches deep.

So Young, Too

A four-year-old got sunburned, and it had reached the peeling-off stage. As he was washing up for dinner, his mother heard him mutter, "Only four years old and wearing out already!"

The SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

R. Barclay Warren, B.A., B.D.

The Church Reaches Out
Acts 8:4-8, 14-17, 26-28, 34-38

Memory Selection: By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one for another. John 13:35.

The early church was quick to heed the command given them by Jesus: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." Mark 16:15. The whole church responded. Today's lesson records the response of one of the seven men chosen to care for the daily ministration for the needy. He was full of the Holy Spirit and wisdom. He went over to the city of Samaria and preached Christ to them. They gave heed to his words and marvelled at the miracles wrought at his hand. Unclean spirits crying with loud voice were cast out and the sick were healed. "There was great joy in that city."

This awakening was followed by a visit from the apostles Peter and John. They prayed for the people that they might receive the Holy Ghost. Believing on Jesus was followed by the receiving of the gift of the Holy Ghost. We see a similar pattern in regard to the church at Ephesus. Acts 19:5,6. A study of the biography of many Christians indicate that believing on Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of sins is frequently followed by the receiving of the Holy Ghost purifying the heart (Acts 15:9) and giving them power to witness. Lawson in his book, "Deeper Experiences of Famous Christians" shows this in detail in the lives of many as Moody, Earle, Finney, Wesley, etc. Different terms are used to describe this experience. It is called The Baptism of the Holy Ghost, The Spirit Filled Life, The Consecrated Life, The Higher Life, The Deeper Life, Perfect Love, Entire Sanctification, etc. But the main point is that the believer grasps the privilege of going deeper with God and becoming more effective in His Kingdom.

Philip's next assignment looked like a demotion. He was sent to the desert. But it was an important mission. He was sent to minister to an Ethopian in his chariot. As Philip explained to him the passage about Jesus in the prophecy of Isaiah, the man believed and was baptized. Philip settled at Caesarea. He had four daughters who prophesied. (Acts 21:9) There were many others in the early church who gave themselves and their families to God.

ANNE HIRST
Your Family Counselor

"Dear Anne Hirst: For the past year I've been going with a girl I think so much of that we have talked of marrying. However, I am getting fed up. We have had so many quarrels about my ex-girl friend and her former boy friend! I've suggested we forget all about them. I've done everything to avoid such unpleasantness, I've taken the blame and apologized when I knew I wasn't wrong.

"Now she says it is possible there is another fellow! After a hot argument, I told her she could do as she pleased, I had had enough. She tried to lead around for my apology, but I did not offer it.

"How much is a guy supposed to take to prove he loves a girl? I know as a rule a girl won't admit she is wrong, and I do love her. But is it my place to apologize now? RICH"

DON'T GROVEL

Two people in love usually are on their best behavior. They present their most attractive selves, and consciously or not they suggest the comfortable person they would be to live with day after day. They flatter each other, they smooth over differences of opinion, they are agreeable to the nth degree, striving to make the best possible impression. If they did not, how many friendships would culminate in marriage?

Both sexes, however, sometimes take a different tack. Many a girl, like this one you are fond of, delights in arguments which will (she thinks) rebound to her credit. She cannot resist arousing your jealousy, and, not content with quibbling over former friends, she sugests there is still another lad you must watch out for! She gets a kick out of such scenes, your apologies make her feel superior—and that to her is infinitely more pleasurable than the rapturous romantic attachments many young couples enjoy.

You did well to walk out. What a prospect for marriage! Can you picture such debates going on year after year? Unless there is faith on both sides, there is no foundation for a good married life.

Let her simmer down. During your absence, she may realize how cheap her tactics have been, and if she does, you will get a hurried call to please come back. Then you can put your foot down and tell her you are having no more silly arguments.

No self-respecting young man will continue playing the doormat to such shabby caprice. Let her alone, and if you do not hear from her, it is, I think you will agree, a good riddance.

LANDLORD TROUBLE

"Dear Anne Hirst: The letter you printed about the landlord who made such trouble gives me courage to ask for your advice in a similar situation. My little boy, 8, constantly is being abused by the man who owns our house and lives next door.

"Everything that happens in the neighbourhood he blames on our boy. Once he even struck him! His own children (four) are using foul words; they have even lied against our son. I've been patient but now I can take no more.

"His friends stride through our property, dropping litter and getting intoxicated in our back yard. Do I have to take more of such goings-on? The trouble is, there isn't another place available in the neighbourhood which is convenient to the school and to my husband's business. "FURIOUS."

In these days of scarce accomodations, it is a toss-up whether children or parents suffer more from unpleasant neighbours. A day of reckoning must come, and then abusive owners will find the tables turned.

The next time this owner causes trouble, call in the law to settle with him. So long as you pay your rent and he cannot prove his charges against your boy, it is not likely he can turn you out.

You have my sympathy.

GRIMM REJOINER

Prompted by a desire to help his club, John Phillips, the Chicago Cub statistician, took a whirl at scouting one summer. He heard about a wonderful young pitcher and hurried out to take a look. The prospect proved to be even greater than anticipated. Phillips phoned the then Cub manager, Charlie Grimm, in frantic haste.

"Charlie," he said excitedly, "I've landed the greatest young pitcher in the land. He struck out every man who came to bat — twenty-seven in a row! Nobody even got a foul until two were out in the ninth. The pitcher is right here with me. What shall I do?"

Lincoln Had Marriage Troubles Too

Almost a century ago, Abraham Lincoln and Mary Todd were married, in Springfield, Illinois, and their marriage proved to be one of the most unfortunate unions in the history of the United States.

The only comment that Lincoln ever made in writing about his marriage, was a postscript that he added to a business letter, written a week after the event. The letter was written to Samuel Marshal, and it is now in the possession of the Chicago Historical Society. In it, Lincoln says "There is no news here except my marriage, which to me is a matter of profound wonder."

William H. Herndon was Lincoln's law partner for a fifth of a century, and Herndon knew Lincoln better than any other man ever knew him; and Herndon said, "If Lincoln ever had a happy day in twenty years, I never knew of it." And Herndon thought that Lincoln's marriage had a lot to do with his sadness.

I once spent three years writing a biography of Lincoln, and while I was writing it, I believe I made as careful study of the home life of the Lincoln family as it is possible for anyone to make. I carefully examined and re-examined every shred of evidence that is in existence; and I came to the reluctant and painful conclusion that the greatest tragedy in Abraham Lincoln's life was his marriage.

Shortly after he and Mary Todd were engaged, Lincoln began to realize that they were exact opposites, in every way, and that they could never be happy. They were the exact opposites in temperament, in tastes, in training and desires, writes Dale Carnegie in The Police Gazette.

For example, Mary Todd had attended a snobbish finishing school in Kentucky; she spoke French with a Parisian accent, and was one of the best-educated women in Illinois. But Lincoln had attended a total of less than twelve months in his entire life.

She was extremely proud of her family. Her grandfathers and great-grandfathers and great-uncles had been generals and governors, and one had been Secretary of the Navy.

But Lincoln had no pride whatever in his family tree. He said that only one of his relatives had ever visited him while he lived in Springfield, and that one was accused of stealing a jew's harp before he got out of town.

Mary Todd was deeply interested in dress and show and ostentation. But Lincoln took no interest whatever in his appearance. In fact, he would sometimes walk down the street with one trouser leg on the outside of his boot and the other trouser leg stuffed in the inside of his boot.

Mary had been taught that good table manners were almost a sacred rite; but Lincoln had been reared in a log cabin with a dirt floor, and he stuck his own knife into the butter plate and did a score of things that shocked Mary and drove her wild.

She was proud and haughty. He was humble and democratic. She was intensely jealous; and created a scene of he merely looked at another woman.

Shortly after they were engaged, Lincoln wrote her a letter saying that he didn't love her sufficiently to marry her. He gave this letter to his friend, Joshua Speed, and asked Speed to give it to Mary Todd. Speed tore up the letter, threw it in the fire and told Lincoln to go and see Mary Todd himself. He did, and when he told her that he didn't want to marry her, she started to cry. Lincoln could never stand seeing a woman cry; so he took her in his arms, kissed her, said he was sorry.

The wedding day was set for January 1, 1841. The wedding cake was baked, the guests were assembled, the preacher was there, but Lincoln didn't appear. Why? Well, Mary Todd's sister afterwards explained it by saying that Lincoln went crazy. And her husband added: "Yes, crazy as a loon." The fact is that he did become ill — dangerously ill in body and ill in mind, and he sank into a spell of melancholy so deep and so terrible that it almost unbalanced his reason. His friends found him at daylight, mumbling incoherent sentences. He said he didn't want to live. He wrote a poem on suicide and had it published in one of the Springfield papers, and his friends took his knife away from him, to keep him from killing himself.

Lincoln then wrote the most pitiful letter of his life. It was written to his law partner who was then in Congress. This is the letter:

"I am now the most miserable man living. If what I feel were equally distributed to the whole human family, there would not be one cheerful face on earth. Whether I shall ever be any better, I cannot tell. I awfully forbode that I shall not. To remain as I am is impossible. I must die or be better it seems to me."

For almost two years after that, Lincoln had nothing whatever to do with Mary Todd. Then a self-appointed matchmaker in Springfield brought them together again, behind closed doors, and Mary Todd told Lincoln it was his duty to marry her. And he did.

While I was out in Illinois, writing that book about Lincoln, I went to see Uncle Jimmy Miles, a farmer who lives near Springfield. One of his uncles was Herndon, Lincoln's law partner; and one of his aunts ran a boarding house where Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln came to live shortly after they were married. Uncle Jimmy Miles told me that he had often heard his aunt tell this story: One morning, Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln were having breakfast with the rest of the boarders, and Lincoln said something that displeased his wife; so she picked up a cup of hot coffee and dashed it into his face, and she did it in the presence of the other boarders. Lincoln didn't answer her. He didn't scold her. He said nothing while the landlady brought a wet cloth and wiped off his face and clothes.

But let us not judge Mrs. Lincoln too harshly. She finally went insane; and perhaps much earlier her mind was being affected by insanity.

One of the most beautiful things I know about Abraham Lincoln is the fact that he endured his unhappy home life for twenty-three years without bitterness, without resentment and without saying a word about it to anyone. He endured it with Christ-like forgiveness, and with a patience that was almost divine.

CHRONICLES OF GINGER FARM
Gwendoline P Clarke

The Easter season has come and gone and whatever the weather before and after no one could possibly have asked for a better Easter Sunday. Sun shining all day and reasonably warm for the first of April.

Easter is such a happy occasion, especially as its promise of spiritual rebirth coincides with nature's awakening to new life once again. Special church services, Easter flowers and lovely choral music in churches, and by radio and television, all contribute so much. Everything cheerful and full of promise. If we don't feel a lift in our hearts we must indeed be dull and unreceptive. No doubt Old Country people will agree with me that at Easter our thoughts are apt to drift homewards more than at any other time of the year. Not necessarily with regret but rather in grateful remembrance. It makes us happpy to recall the lovely shaded country lanes, banks yellow-dotted with primroses and the air sweet-scented from the shy violets in woods and lanes. No wonder Robert Browning wrote —"Oh, to be in England now that April's here!" If one had the time, the opportunity and the money, wouldn't it be wonderful to fly over to the Old Country just to see the primroses and violets in bloom once again? However, if that isn't possible we at least have our memories. The philosophy that "it is better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all" applies to more than human relations. It applies equally well to places and things that have brought us happiness in days gone by. And yet even as we remember the past, consciously or unconsciously, we are building up new memories to treasure in the days to come, for the present will eventually become the past as we move day by day into the future.

By special request I went to Toronto to help Daughter with a day's shopping. Dave had to be taken along too as he needed to be fitted for shoes and a few other things. Believe me, we had a most interesting and energetic day. Dave was really quite good but of course staying very long in one place was not to be expected. However, we coped with that by having a harness on our young man. So while Mummy shopped for drapes and shirts, Grandma took charge of Dave, who was constantly finding new worlds to explore—the world of moving staircases, elevators to ride in and toys that might be seen but not touched. When we came to anything that moved Dave had one request—"I go too!" which meant that Grandma followed. When our shopping was done—it lasted four hours—we went over to his Dad's office—and that was an unexpected thrill. Needless to say Dave dropped off to sleep in the street-car coming home, and stayed asleep while being transported from street-car to stroller and from the stroller to his crib. The little man had had quite a day. But oh dear, what a bitter cold wind we had to contend with. I was really glad to be back home and out of the weather.

On Good Friday, although it was a miserable day, the family drove out here—with Dave none the worse for wear. They had stopped at Oakville on the way up intending to visit Bob and Joy but changed their minds when they found the street where they live practically impassable—mud and ruts almost axle deep due to storm sewer operations. It has been like that for weeks. Even though Bob manages to struggle in and out with his car it can't be very good for the motor. Saturday, before they could get out to come up here Bob had to jack up the car and put stone down in the ruts. Just one of the joys of suburban life! Looks as if horse-and-buggy conditions are sometimes with us yet —but without the horse and buggy to help us out.

The motor traffic over the week-end must have been terrific. We noticed it in rather a peculiar way on this road. One time in particular I was working in the kitchen. Of course the doors and windows were closed, and yet although we are quite a piece in from the road I soon became conscious of a steady, incessant rumbling—due to atmospheric conditions and traffic on the road. What will it be when Highway 401 goes through!

Saturday night we had unexpected callers. About nine o'clock our good watch-dog was making a great to-do. There wasn't a car in sight but amid the bedlam we heard a knock at the door. A middle-aged couple claimed to have come off the Hamilton bus and were looking for a family—of whom we had never heard—but who apparently lived about 5 miles south-east of here. The story may have been true but it sounded a little suspicious. Partner suggested they go back to the gas station and call a taxi. They were certainly taking chances — by walking on a strange road on a dark night—and in dark clothes—and by walking up to a farm house without knowing what dogs were around. And if I had been alone—and without a dog—I wouldn't have been too happy when this strange couple appeared on our doorstep. Sunday we had more unexpected callers.

When Harry Greb Beat Gene Tunney

Harry Greb, one of the ring's greats — some say the greatest, pound for pound — was never greater than the night he defeated Gene Tunney, May 24, 1922. It was the lone defeat in the career of the man who was to score one of the ring's biggest upsets by toppling Jack Dempsey from the heavyweight throne.

The win over Tunney earned Greb the American light-heavyweight crown. Before his death four years and five months later the Pittsburgh Windmill, as Greb was known, had trounced no fewer than ten pugilists who attained championships. They were, in addition to Tunney, Mike McTigue, Battling Levinsky, Tommy Loughran, Tiger Flowers, Johnny Wilson, Al McCoy, Mike O'Dowd, George Chip and Mickey Walker. Though never more than a middleweight, Greb also vanquished many topnotchers in the five divisions, welter to heavyweight inclusive.

He scaled one-quarter of a pound over 162, twelve and one-quarter less than Tunney, the night of their first meeting, in the old Madison Square Garden. It was Greb's tenth year as a pro, and Tunney was younger by four years, but on this occasion youth was served a terrific shellacking. At the finish of the 15-round battle the younger and heavier man was one of the worst beaten ever to totter from a ring.

Before the clang of the starting bell had died down, Greb was clawing and ripping at his heavier rival. In the midst of this first furious attack, Harry whipped over a right that broke his opponent's nose in two places; moments later he opened a gash over Tunney's left eye so wide and deep that it bled throughout the 15 rounds.

Greb's gloves were soon blood-soaked, and by the time the fight was a little more than half over, it had become so one-sided that Referee Kid McPartland tried to intervene. But each time he'd move to stop the massacre, the beaten man would protest that he had a title at stake. So one gruesome round followed another, and how Tunney went the distance is something to be attributed only to his courage.

Why the gash over Tunney's eye could not be patched up is hard to explain. Doc Bagley, an expert on cuts, was chief second in Gene's corner, and he all but poured adrenalin into the wound, but to no avail.

Despite his loss of blood and Greb's relentless pounding. Tunney was never off his feet, amazing the ringsiders and, most of all, even Greb. More surprising was the fact that after a punishing first and second round, Gene made spirited rallies in the next two rounds, though in the fourth he suffered a severe cut over his other eye. By now the affair was a shambles.

But in the seventh Tunney made another pretty good rally, arousing hope in his corner. Maybe the Windmill was starting to run down? A false hope, indeed. Greb's main stock-in-trade, in addition to his proud fighting heart, was his inexhaustible stamina and his trick of relaxing without appearing to do so. He had this ability so well perfected that he could appear to be mauling an opponent hen he was doing nothing more than smothering an attack.

Then, as his opponent tried to ease up for a breather, Harry would turn on the heat.

When Greb opened upon Tunney in the eighth as though the bout had just started, Gene's backers lost all hope. All they wanted now was to see their man go the distance. This did not seem humanly possible. Through the last half of the battle, the only respite afforded Gene by an opponent who seemed equipped with a half-dozen tireless arms, came when Harry pushed his victim to one side to dry his bloody mitts on his trunks, or on the referee's shirt. But Tunney remained on his feet even through the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth rounds.

Yes, Tunney was still on his feet at the final bell and managed to reach his dressing room still erect. But no sooner did the door close than he collapsed unconscious on the rubbing table and was out for several seconds. His body was so badly swollen as a result of the beating that it was actually necessary to cut his tights off. As this was being done, Gene regained consciousness and murmured through his battered lips:

"I'll beat him the next time!"

"He's sure got guts," was Greb's comment.

It is the contention of some that Greb, already losing sight in one eye, was on the downgrade from this fight on, but the record doesn't bear this out. The following January he beat the up-and-coming Tommy Loughran in ten of the 15 rounds fought for the crown Harry had wrested from Tunney. And, only 24 days later, he again put his laurels on the line aginst Tunney — which goes to prove the kind of champion Harry Greb was.

If Harry was over the hill by now, the return tilt with Tunney failed to prove it, even though the decision went against Greb. It was decided on a split decision after fifteen rough-house rounds, and was so close that the title changed hands on the word of Referee Patsy Haley.

Before 1923 was over Greb was again a champion after trouncing middleweight Johnny Wilson in a battle which made him look like the old perpetual-motion fighting machine.

Two months and ten days later Harry made another bid for Tunney's light heavyweight championship. It was another stirring scrap, though there was no doubt as to the better man this time. If Greb had not slipped some by now, then Tunney was much improved. They met twice again in non-decision ten-rounders. In one, at Cleveland, the going was again close. In the other, at St. Paul, Greb got a severe going over. According to Tunney, it was in a late round in this fight during a clinch that Greb said:

"Gene, don't knock me out."

Still, Harry looked anything but washed up only a little more than three months later in his famous fight with Mickey Walker, then welterweight king. Mickey scaled 152 for the contest, and only the heavier man's laurels were at stake. Though Mickey gave away six pounds in this clash, he was to go on to capture the 160-pound laurels from Harry's conqueror, Tiger Flowers, and to fight the top-notchers among the heavies and light heavies, beating Paul Berlenbach, Leo Lomski, Johnny Risko, King Levinsky, Paolino Uzcudun and a long list of others, including Jack Sharkey. But against Greb, the Toy Bulldog, as Mickey was known, ran a decided second.

Greb was definitely no longer the old Greb when he lost his middleweight laurels to Flowers, though the 15-round verdict was close. In their return encounter five months later, the edge was clearly with the Georgia Deacon as Flowers was known.

This second setback by the Deacon was the Pittsburgh Windmill's last fight. Two months and three days later on October 22, 1926, Greb was dead following a nasal operation. However, Harry had lived sufficiently long to see his prediction concerning his old rival, Tunney, come true.

Soon after Greb's fifth meeting with Tunney, a writer ran into Harry and joshingly inquired as to when and where was the Greb-Tunney series to be continued. Then it was that Harry made an amazing admission.

"He is one party," Harry replied, "I am positively through fighting."

"Why?" we asked.

"Gene's grown too big and too strong for me. Say, that guy has developed a right drive to the heart that just about tears your insides out. Take it from me, some day Tunney'll be in there fighting Dempsey, and when that days comes, I'll have a nice bet on Gene to take the heavyweight title."

Greb collected a good chunk on that fight one month before he passed away. Harry died after an eye operation on October 22, 1926.

Was Greb the greatest of the middleweight? In the judgment of one who has seen them all, from Bob Fitzsimmons on, Fitzsimmons, a cagey and terrible hitter, might have taken the Pittsburgher.

But this assumption is contradicted by Harry Greb's great record. He fought the best of his day — from 1914 to 1926 —and among his opponents were some of the most terrific punchers that ever entered the ring. Look at the list: Mickey Walker, Mike Gibbons, Soldier Bartfield, Max Rosenbloom, Battling Levensky, Gunboat Smith, Billy Miskie and scores of other great fighters. And none of them ever put Harry to sleep.

RIGHT HONORABLE WINSTON CHURCHILL'S LANDRACE BOAR

The proud owners of these outstanding imported Landrace sows which were bred to this outstanding boar of Sir Winston Churchill, also received with this shipment a total of 13 imported sows and 1 boar of different Swedish blood lines. These animals were purchased from some of the most outstanding breeders in Great Britain.
This shipment makes the fourth importation of Landrace swine which the Fergus Landrace Swine Farm have brought to Fergus within the last few months. 95% of the swine in Denmark are Landrace, but in the last few years this breed has become very popular in England, Scotland and the United States, and many swine breeders in Canada believe they will become very popular in Canada.
They are the bacon type hog, longer than many of the breeds in Canada, they do not become as fat, are very hardy, and it is predicted they will play a very important roll in improving the quality of our bacon and other Pork products in Canada.

Looking Ahead
WITH
JOHN A. D. ALGUIRE

"Better late than never" is a saying which does not apply to life assurance. Too often late means never. If you delay in applying for the proper amount of assurance protection you may ultimately find you have fallen below the required medical standards. Each day medical examiners are obliged to turn down applications for insurance from people whose need for it is great. Many of these disappointed people could have qualified a year or so earlier but the development of a health impairment makes them now uninsurable.

Statistically speaking, 20% of men are already uninsurable when they reach the age of forty. Keep this figure in mind. Don't be too late applying for your life assurance. Call me today!
