Chesterville Wins Round, Last Night 2-1 : Round 4-3

Chesterville is certainly some excited about hockey this morning when they find their team of kids just one game from the Citizen Shield after trimming the great Magedomas of Brockville on the latter's ice last night 2 to 1, with every player in the line-up covering himself with glory. Standing open-mouthed with surprise after the tie game here Monday night many hoped almost against hope that the High School Kids could invade the enemy's own bailliwick and carry off the honours. A large following trailed them to Brockville last night and pulled with all their might for the win which was given them in impressive style, and which was acknowledged by the Brockville players who immediately invaded the Chesterville dressing-room and wished them success in their remaining games. Senator Fulford was among the first to greet the winners and said the better team had won.

Among those from a distance who caught the eye were Rev. L. E. Staley, of Gananoque, and Jim Prescott, of Westport, both enthusiastic supporters of the Chesterville club. There were dozens of others pulling for a win for the Central Ottawa Valley champions, while the Brockville supporters held nothing back when Chesterville flashed some particularly nice play.

Chesterville, by conserving every effort and playing for the breaks, managed to score when goals were most needed, and, despite the greater experience of their opponents, outguessed the Magedomas in the crucial points and scored the winning goal with less than six minutes of the third and final period left to play. There was no score in the first period with Brockville losing a multitude of chances by not following in on their shots while Fyke was down on his knees in the Chesterville goal.

Chesterville Scores First

In the second period as well Brockville carried the play to Chesterville and it was in this session that Helmer, on a lone rush, worked by the Magedomas defence to send one in shoulder high at Murray which struck the latter's left arm and went into the corner of the net. Five minutes later Dexter and Walsh combined on a nice combination play which brought results, the former sinking the puck to tie the count.

Brockville wore themselves out in the final session in an effort to notch the winning goal. The kids played carefully and broke up almost every attack of the Magedomas who were playing four and five men down on the offensive. McAvoy and Jarvis broke away at the Chesterville blue line, the former carrying the puck and with only Cowie and Murray ahead, he faked a pass to fool Cowie, drew Murray out on another fake and sunk the puck into the net for the winning goal with six minutes and 10 seconds left to play.

Magedomas threw every possible effort into the dying moments of the game and changed their lines frequently in the hope of tying the count but to no avail. Chesterville threw a thin red line across the ice, which the sailors could not penetrate. In the course of the game, which was lightning fast at all times, Jimmy Fyke was called upon to make 57 stops in the Chesterville goal, while Jack Murray, in the Brockville nets, had 38 to handle. Magedomas rained in 24 shots on Fyke in the last period, but his net was impregnable and the defence ahead of him managed to stem the flow of blue-clad Magedomas attempting to follow in for rebounds.

The frantic cries of the Brockville supporters could be heard for blocks as they exhorted their idols to score, but Chesterville played in masterly fashion, and withstood all attacks, Their supporters went into ectasies of delight when the final bell sounded, bringing them hard-earned and delectable victory.

Cleanly Played.

Considering the importance of the contest and the rivalry which existed between the players, the game was cleanly fought. George Foster, Ottawa, handled the match well, imposing 12 penalties, four of which went to Lapierre, of Chesterville, in the second period.

Chesterville has a young team, with Alf Jarvis, a seasoned veteran, as captain and leading play-maker. Billy Clarmont, a boy of 16 years, on right wing, is as speedy a performer as has been seen in the playdowns in years. McAvoy, on left wing, is a tricky player, and between the three stars mentioned, the great marjority of Brockville's excursions in search of goals were broken up by hard and determined checking. Lapierre and Helmer, on the defence, young and rangy players, stepped into the Brockville players time and time again to break up attacks, and Fyke, in goal, was all to the good. Chesterville's second line, Plantz, Lynch and James, when doing relief duty kept the Magedomas skating hard. Dagenais subbed on defence.

The teams were:

Chesterville—Fyke, goal; Helmer, Lapierre, defence; Jarvis, centre; Clarmont, McAvoy, wings; Plantz, James, Lynch, Dagenais, subs.

Magedomas—Murray, goal; Cowie, Dexter, defence; Kennedy, centre; Woodcock, Hueston, wings; Watt, Lowrey, McGuire, Walsh, subs.

Referee—George Foster, Ottawa.

The first game in the next round will be with Carleton Place in that town Friday or Monday night and the winners of the round will hold the Citizen Shield for the next year. Chesterville was presented with the Hamilton Cup ,emblematic of the Central Ottawa championship, Monday night by the donor, Mr. W .Hamilton, with Alf Jarvis, captain of the team, on the receiving end.

The final game between Carleton Place and Chesterville will be on Chesterville ice next Monday night night unless posters give different date.

Interested In Broadcast

Mrs. Elton Doney, née Jane Fyke, of Potsdam, N. Y., writing to The Record says she much enjoyed the broadcast of the Brockville-Chesterville game Monday night from the local rink, when it came in so clearly she could even hear the announcer conversing with the spectators. She also heard Dr. Hutt, Alf Jarvis, Harold Hamilton, and Tom Flynn say their few words, and she did not wonder that the announcer thought he heard airplanes when the fast train passed by as it sounded just like that to her at Potsdam.

Sleepers of Montreal Express Leave Rails at Mountain

Wednesday morning about five minutes after six as the Montreal express eastbound from Toronto was passing through Mountain station, three sleepers following the day coach left the rails and plunged along between the north and south tracks, remaining upright, and the passengers receiving no more injury than a considerable shaking-up. The cause of the accident is said to have been the breaking of the automatic coupler between the first class coach and the sleeper. Mr. and Mrs. Leo Kearns and family, on their way from Detroit to Chesterville, were among the passengers.

Delightful Skating Party

The C. G. I. T. Group of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church held an enjoyable skating party on Thursday evening. The early part of the evening was spent at the local skating rink, and after skating, the girls and their friends went to the Library where dainty refreshments were served. After supper an enjoyable time was spent in a sing-song and playing games. Among the guests were Rev. A. H. and Mrs. Scroule.

A pleasant evening was brought to a conclusion by all forming a friendship circle and singing "Auld Lang Syne"

Old Broder Homestead Badly Damaged by Fire

Fire almost destroyed the old farm residence of the late Hon. Andrew Broder, north of the C. N. R. tracks at Morrisburg on Saturday afternoon.

The outbreak started from a spark from a defective chimney, and before local firefighters could reach the scene the whole building was in flames.

At present occupied by the family of Joseph Gauthier, the old homestead was bought by Mr. Broder in 1896, soon after his election to the Federal Parliament, and was occupied by him during the remainder of his life.

The house was occupied and the farm worked by Fred S. Broder, son of Hon. Mr. Broder, until its sale to the present owners two years ago. Mr. Gauthier intends to reconstruct the farmhouse, using some of the walls left standing by the fire.

Celebrate Fifty Years of Wedded Life

MR. AND MRS. FRANK McCLOSKEY

On Saturday, February 20th, Mr. and Mrs. F. McCloskey celebrated the golden anniversary of their marriage.

At 8 a.m. a Mass of Thanksgiving was offered in St. Mary's Church by the pastor, Rev. Father Keaney, Rev. Father Staley, Gananoque, formerly of Chesterville, being present in the Sanctuary.

Mr. and Mrs. McCloskey were fortunate in having with them all their family, with the exception of Francis, now on a Mediterranean cruise; their four grandchildren, and their niece, Mrs. R. W. Dodson, of Detroit.

Later in the day they received their many friends who called to express their congratulations and best wishes.

The rooms were beautifully decorated with roses and spring flowers,—noticeably among which was a basket of fifty roses, a tribute from the members of St. Mary's parish. The tea room was particularly attractive with its colour scheme of gold.

Mrs. E. F. Holcomb, of Ottawa; Mrs. J. T. Campbell, of Finch, and Mrs. James McAvoy presided at the tea table.

Lovely music was graciously contributed by Miss Marian Casselman and Miss Rae Dixon, which added much to the pleasure of the guests. A delightful surprise was received by Mr. and Mrs. McCloskey when the Oddfellows' Quartette called and extended their good wishes in the form of several solos.

Chesterville 2; Brockville 2 In First Playdown Game

Chesterville's starry young champions of the Central Ottawa Valley Hockey League waged a forceful and brilliant brand of play to hold Brockville Magedomas, Rideau Group finalists, to a 2-2 tie in the first of a two-game series in the Ottawa and District playdowns Monday night.

Though holding the visitors well in check at every stage of the struggle to gain an even break in the points distribution, Chesterville's achievement Monday night created a mild surprise. With but two of last year's senior players to compete with Brockville in the matter of experience, and comprised for the most part of last year's juniors, Chesterville delighted a crowd of almost 1,000 fans with their determined style of play.

Young and aggressive, the Central Ottawa champions refused to recognize the advantages of weight and experience and more than held their own at every stage of the battle. It was a clean and interesting tussle from start to finish, with Referee George Foster, who handled the game in highly capable manner, meting out but two minor penalties.

With practically the same squad that turned aside all opposition in the district and won its way to the Ottawa and Disrict finals against Shamrocks two years ago, Brockville shaded the young Chesterville club, but their superiority stopped at that point.

Sixteen minutes after the opening whistle Francis Plantz gave Chesterville a one-goal lead that faded in the final minute of the same frame as "Rosy" Hueston and Woodcock combined on a spectacular Brockville scoring effort. Mort. Kennedy put the Magedomas out in front in the early minutes of the second stanza but Chesterville burst into action in impressive fashion in the final frame and Reg. Helmer tied it up again on a solo attempt.

It was persistence and pluck in large quantities that brought Chesterville their tie. What they lacked in style they more than made up in aggressiveness. The two smooth functioning front lines repeatedly ran amuck under the pressure applied by the speedy young Chesterville forwards who pursued their covers diligently and chased them out of position to make the openings for their own attack. Magedoma puck carriers who managed to pierce the opposing front rank were confronted with the fine checking of Reg. Helmer and "Chuck" Lapierre who maintained a steady and effective vigil on the defence. Jimmy Fyke, in the nets, handled himself in capable fashion at all times and foiled incoming forwards with many wonderful stops.

Magedomas' shooting proved the weakest part of their offensive, and with their front lines functioning erratically in the earl-- stages of the game, Chesterville gained confidence in the opening period, and captalized on one of the few scoring opportunities provided in a close-checking session. Plantz broke away from near his own defence, and sent a long ankle shot that beat Murray.

The lead was short-lived, however, and a sparkling combination effort by the first-string Magedoma front line evened matters, with but one minute of play remaining in the same period. Elmer Woodcock dashed into the corner and passed out to Hueston who shot through a maze of legs and sticks for the tying goal. The puck bounced off a Chesterville defenceman's leg and evaded Fyke, who had little chance to save from a kneeling position.

Kennedy put the visitors in front four minutes after the start of the second frame, taking Hueston's pass from right wing at centre, slashed the rubber into the net. Improved play on the part of both clubs, however, failed to produce another counter until midway through the last period.

Dangerous though fruitless scoring attempts by Jack McAvoy and Davie Dexter preceded the final goal of the game. Helmer weaved his way up the ice from his own defence and his knee high drive sailed between Murray and the goal post to tie up the score.

A DUCK WILL SWIM

Robert Quillen in the Fountain Inn (S. C.) Tribune

WHEN I was very young and knew everything, I became excited when people did not agree with me. I enjoyed argument and had no patience with imperfect people.

Now I am somewhat older and a little wiser, and I am reconciled to people. I do not argue; I do not lose patience with those who seem foolish.

I know that all men function as they do by reason of their training and their experiences. A woodpecker will peck wood: a duck will swim; a gobbler will strut. It is in the blood.

Do men scold a stone because it isn't a flower? Or curse a hog because of its failure to be a sheep? To condemn a man for being narrow-minded is just as silly as condemning him for being bow-legged.

News and Information For the Busy Farmer

Furnished by the Ontario Department of Agriculture

Farmers Will Benefit

The new hog grading regulations put into effect by promulgation in the Canada Gazette of January 30th, extend the provisions trading in hogs on the basis of the official grades in such a way as entirely to eliminate flat-price trading. Hogs sold from farmer or other producer right down the line to the final packer or processer must be traded in on the basis of the official grades. This ensures to the farmer full benefits of the agreement with the packing industry whereby a premium of one dollar is paid for all hogs grading "Select Bacon.' 'The regulations also provide for that premium for quality, whis is rightly his, passing back in larger measure to the original producer.

Field Roots For Horses

Turnips and carrots are the most commonly used of field roots as feed for horses. There is no question as to the valu of fields roots as feed for horses, a value which is too little appreciated.

Roots are rarely sliced or pulped when fed to horses for the reason that the outstanding virtue in root feeding is the benficial effect on the teeth and gums resulting from the necessary biting into the whole root The principal values of roots in the ration for horses are:

1. Increase palatability.
2. Form a succulent addition highly desirable, forming as it does a food in the natural or unchanged form.
3. Assists in or increases the digestibility of coarse fodders.
4. Benefits the teeth and gums.
5. Are slightly laxative.
6. Cheapens the ration.
7. Form a splendid tonic or conditioner.

Importance of Institutes

While the 1200 Women's Institutes in the Province of Ontario are devoting a good deal of time and thought and drawing upon their resources for relief and community service of various kinds, their main objective is educational.

The country women at their regular monthly meetings pass on to each other much valuable information gained through practical experience, and they are utilizing to splendid advantage the literature available from various sources. The Institutes Branch of the Department of Agriculture provides graduate nurses, dietitians and seamstresses to give systematic instruction to groups of women and girls in their home centres. Last year there were 75 two-week couress in sewing, 41 in home nursing, 25 in food values, and in addition there were 74 three-day courses covering these lines. In a few cases special instruction in handicraft, needlecraft and house furnishings were given. Nearly 5,000 girls and women took advantage of these special courses.

During 1931 there were 31 courses of one month's duration for girls. Twelve hundred young women, mostly girls from the farm, took advantage of this systematic instruction which covered, using, clothing, and food problems, with classes morning and afternoon. The Department of Agriculture is, in this way, trying to take to the girls of rural Ontario some of the advantages enjoyed in the centres of population through classes established in the technical and high schools, as well as in the higher forms of the public schools.

It Pays To Dip Sheep

In discussing the fact of parasites on sheep and methods for their control, a Canadian authority gives four good reasons as to why it pays to dip sheep. These are:

1. Sheep that are free of ticks and lice grow more and better wool.
2. A clean flock requires less feed and is more easily kept in good condition.
3. The lamb crop is stronger, the ewes milk better, and lambs grow more rapidly.
4. Parasites are a source of serious discomfort to sheep. The good shepherd should be mindful of the comfort of his flock.

He also points out that as a result of dipping the saving in feed and increased weight of lambs and wool may easily amount to from 50c to $1.50 per ewe. The cost of dipping under ordinary conditions should not exceed three cents per head.

Must Have License

All persons other than producers, including farmers transporting their own fowl, must have a license from the warden and the county clerk if they want to transport fowl on the highway from one place to another. The provincial statute requires that such licences be taken out regardless of whether or not there is a local by-law, but it is thought the passing of a by-law by county councils strengthens the officials' hands. The purpose of the license is to enable the police to get a better check on chicken thieves as all persons other than the producer or farmer when transporting fowl must carry his license, and produce the same when requested by the authorities and also show a record of purchase from the vendor. The license regulation does not apply to a private citizen transporung fowl bought from a farmer, but will be required from a purchaser if he is a dealer in fowl.

The Use of Potash

It is the light, sandy and gravelly soils and muck soils that as a rule are markedly deficient in potash, and on which profitable returns may be expected from the application of this element. The rate of application will, of course, depend on a number of factors, chief among which are the character and fertility of the soil, and the nature of the crops to be grown. For most grain crops an application of muriate of potash of 50 to 75 pounds per acre will be found sufficient. For clover and alfalfa these amounts might be doubled with profit. For potatoes, roots, corn and leafy crops generally, 100 lbs. of muriate of potash per acre may be considered an average dressing, but frequently 200 pounds may be profitably used. As a rule it will be found more advantageous to use potash with forms of nitrogen and phosphoric acid than alone and it is alwyas advisable to try out the fertilizer on a small scale before making large purchases.

Clover and Grass Seed

Due to the low cost of Ontario-produced clover and grass seed this year, farmers may seed 10 to 20 acres more than they have been in the habit of doing, states A. H. Martin, Markets Board. In addition to this ,the total cost of seed will be matrially less. Nature has endeavoured, it would appear to offset low prices by providing a bountiful crop. Almost every clover field in the Province has produced its allotment of seed and in most cases, seed of very high quality.

The 1931 legume crop in Ontario has been estimated at varying amounts. Even the most conservative estimates, however, place the figure at one which will ensure ample high quality alfalfa, red clover, and alsike of hardy strains, to meet the requirements of every farmer in this Province. This heavy supply of home-grown legume seed is a real blessing to all farmers, particularly those not actually or regularly engaged in the production of small seeds.

Some sections of Ontario are not growing alfalfa to any great extent. If the truth were known, this may be due to the disappointment caused by winter-killing of imported seed. As a soil builder, pasture and hay crop producer, alfalfa stands supreme. As a green manure crop, alfalfa opens up the soil, adds nitrates and other plant foods to a value far greater than the price of the seed. As a hay crop alfalfa outyields all others both in quality and quantity. It was the only crop to remain green for pasture during recent dry years in Western Ontario. In sections where alfalfa has not yet secured a foothold, it should be sown in mixtures with other legumes.

This year clover, alfalfa and alsike, are very reasonable in price. Present conditions afford a splendid opportunity for a more extensive seeding down of legume crops for hay, pasture, and as a green manure crop to be ploughed down.

ADVANTAGES OF EARLY HATCHING

Experimental Farms Note

PULLETS are almost the only source of eggs during the fall and early winter months. Hens are sure to moult at that time of the year, and they may take about three months to go through the complete moult. It is therefore important that farmers and commercial poultrymen should have their pullets hatched early enough to begin laying in time for the high prices which usually prevail in November, December and January. Eggs laid in March and April do not bring very high prices, and a pullet that does not lay until after the first of the year may never justify her existence.

The best results can never be obtained if pullets are forced to lay before they are matured. Such birds are usually more susceptible to disease and are more easily thrown off their laying than are birds which have reached a good size. A pullet cannot, even under summer conditions, lay on flesh, grow feathers, and produce eggs at the same time so it will be almost impossible to get eggs in winter from the late hatched pullets. A good early hatched pullet should be well matured at the time that heavy egg production is wanted.

Leghorn pullets and pullets of similar breeds hatched about the middle of April and properly handled will be just about ready to start producing in October. Heavier breeds such as Plymouth Rocks, Rhode Island Reds and White Wyandottes, will usually require about an additional month for growth.

At the Dominion Experimental Station, Lacombe, Alberta, a test has been conducted over a seven-year period to determine the best date for incubation with regard to fertility and hatchability of eggs, and viability of chicks. White Wyandotte hatching eggs are set during March, April, May and June, and records kept of the results of fertility, hatchability, and mortality of chicks to six weeks of age for each month. The hatching results for May were slightly below the average of the other two months. The mortality in June hatched chicks was very high, partly for the reason that in very warm weather it is impossible to properly regulate the brooder temperatures. June hatched chicks also lacked vitality and were unsatisfactory as layers. March and April hatched pullets which started to lay from October 1 to November 30 made on the average the best winter records, while from the standpoint of annual egg yield the advantage lies with those which started laying before November 15th.

"It was only a year ago that I started in with my company on $25 a week, and now I earn $50."

"Yes? It's easy to earn that, but how much do you get?' '

Mother: "Sit down, Willie, and amuse your little sister. Tell her a story."

Willie: "I've just told a story to dad, and—I—I can't sit down."

Puzzled Dorothy

Mother was busy, cleaning a chicken for the family dinner.

Little Dorothy watched the process with keen interest, especially when the entrails were being taken out of the fowl.

"Mother," asked the child, finally, "just what are you looking for in there?"

Lights and Shades of London

ROMANCE ON WHEELS

WHEN normal London-folk have gone home to bed the coffee-stalls come trundling out of the mysterious dark to stay at street corners and bridge-heads until dawn. Ask your friends if they have ever sought refreshment at a coffee-stall. I wager that perhaps only the Bad Boy of the Family or Dance Club Jane have experienced the happiness of sausages at 3 a.m. in this temple of romance.

The coffee-stall at the street corner is the only thing left in our modern world that approximates to the mediæval inn or guest-house. Hotels are graded and standardized, and you know exactly the kind of people you will find in them. Good hotels are so much alike that patrons often have to ask the hall porter whether they are in London or Rome.

But the little coffee-stall, set netwise at street corners to catch queer fish is dramatic. If ever I write a play the first act will take place round a coffee-stall; but I am told this has been done; and no wonder. Here it is that you, like some traveller in the old days before the last dragon died, will meet varlets and squires, knights on some bright errantry, damsels in distress, and many a wandering fool: all the old candles of Romance like moths round a flame dropping in out of the night to snatch a sausage and then off, mysterious, elusive, into the night.

There was a mist round the coffee-stall when I found it: one of those strange, fugitive fogs that drift like ghosts at night in the hollows. In the mist the stall was a glow-worm, yellow and furry, warm and desirable, a home to wanderers and fly-by-nights, comforting with its smell of hot coffee and its pungent, inviting sizzle.

Six or seven people, black against the yellowness and the banked Woodbins and the tiers of depressing cakes, gazed suspiciously as I came in out of the incalculable dark, for after a certain time of morning every plain man may have the mark of the devil on him. Round this stall were the following people:

A young man with a silk hat on the back of his head and a white evening scarf hanging over a white shirt front.

A young girl with yellow, shingled hair and a pair of silver dance shoes peeping out from under a moleskin cloak.

A very arch young woman, who was making hopeless eyes at the young man in the silk hat out of sheer enthusiasm, as she ground cigarette stump after cigarette stump into her saucer.

Three or four workmen from neighbouring road repairs.

Two men holding little black bags, who may have been telephone officials, burglars, printers, disguised peers, or returning prodigal sons, but mostly they looked like uncles from Balham.

From the young man in the silk hat I eaves-dropped that everything was "topping" and that Millie was "awfully struck" on Arthur, and from his pretty partner I gathered that coffee and buns at 3 a.m. were awfully good fun, and that she had sprung a ladder in her stocking.

"By why," she asked, "are coffee-stalls licensed to sell stamps?"

The arch young woman looked up swiftly, and said all in one breath:

"So that men can write home and tell their wives why they were kept late at the office. Who's going to stand me a coffee?"

No one laughed; then ,surprisingly, one of the solemn Balham uncles put down the money and as solemnly went on talking to his companion about horses. The arch lady turned her back on them, drank her coffee, borrowed a broken mirror, rouged her lips, said, "Well, cheerio, all!" and vanished, archly.

A taxicab arrived with a clatter, excavated threepence from that deep remoteness where all taxicab drivers keep their money, and departed with the young man and the young woman. The Balham uncles went off with a non-committal air, which made me wonder whether they were off to break into a house or off to home to sleep beneath a scriptural text.

"All sorts, sir, I gets here," said the coffee-stall man as he sloshed about among the dirty plates. "You remember that cat burglar, him what broke into Grosvenor Gardens the other night? I've 'ad him 'ere. 'Safact! Talkin' to a reel lord, he was, too! Yes; I get a lord now and again, but they ain't no different from ordinary people. They eats their sausages like everybody else and leaves the gristle like everybody else and only puts tuppence under the saucer. Why, you might be a lord for all I know——"

He paused, then in case I might get proud and haughty he added:

"Or a cat burglar. . . . Well, as I was sayin', up comes this 'ere cat burglar, smart as you like, puts a little black bag where your leanin' now—full of jools it was, but I didn't know—and he asks for a cup of coffee and a barth bun. He chips into the conversation, and talks to 'is lordship quite the gentleman. 'Nice chap that,' says 'is nibs after he'd gone. 'What is he?' 'I dunno.' I tell him; and at that moment up run a couple of coppers, all hot and bothered. ''Ave you seen a dark young man wearin' a blue double-breasted suit, height five foot ten and a narf and of a pale complexion?' 'Thousands,' I says, going on wiping up; I could see something was up and I wasn't splittin'. Then they told me about 'im, and I told them about 'im, and off they ran like a couple of ferrets. Catch him? Not likely. . . . Good mornin'. sir!"

Suddenly into the circle of light stepped a man carrying a cat that had been born white. A thin, melancholy cat and a thin ,melancholy man, middle-aged, rain-coated, and grim. He placed the thin cat on the oilcloth counter, and the man behind at once poured out a saucer of milk.

The cat slunk to it guiltily. The man watched it as if he had never seen a cat before, and stroked its back. Then he buttoned it inside his raincoat and went away.

"Collects cats, he does," said the coffee-stall man as he banged about among his unwashed china. "Says they follow him. Most nights he comes along with a stray cat, buys it milk, takes it home and looks after it. Regular walkin' cats' home, he is. . . . Good morning, sir . . "

Round the bend of the road swung the first gold tramcar of a new day.

Big Game Hunter: "Oh, I've been nearly eaten by lions many times, but life without a little risk would be very tame."

Mr. Subbubs: "I agree. Many times when the weather has seemed doubtful I have deliberately gone without my umbrella!"

IN MEMORIAM

Hamilton—In loving memory of a dear wife and mother, Mrs. Wm. Hamilton, who died Feb. 26th, 1930.

She was such a good mother,
So patient, kind, and true;
There never was a cloud so dark or heavy
But she saw the sunshine through.
Friends may think we have forgotten
When at times they see us smile,
But they little know the heartache
Which that smile hides all the while.

—Sadly missed by husband and family.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1932.

Seems funny that ten thousand Americans would leave George Washington's country to celebrate his birthday in Montreal.

Wireless will one day be used to exterminate germs, says a scientist. The only difficulty at present is to get the little beggars to listen.

A prize kitten, we are told, which is owned by a wealthy woman, has cream from a silver bowl every morning. It must be amusing to see the butler catching the animal's evening mouse.

After twelve years of experimentation, a Swiss watchmaker has perfected a watch of ordinary size operated by electricity which will run a year without re-charging. The timepiece should prove a boon to those who regularly forget to wind-up their watches before going to bed, and who wait in the morning for the clock to strike, only to hear it sound one dong for the half-hour.

CAUTION TO GRAIN GROWERS

Beware of "High Pressure" Sales Methods Used to I troduce New Untested Varieties

THE TIME OF YEAR has again arrived when seed for the coming crop is being offered for sale. Apart from the channels through which seed is ordinarily disposed of. namely, seed houses, seed growers' associations and from farmers direct, there is always present the "high pressure" salesman endeavouring to dispose of seed of new varieties at high prices.

While there is a perfectly natural desire on the part of a grower to try a new variety in the hope that it might be better adapted to his local conditions than the standard sorts, this desire has often led to regrettable results and such cases only emphasize the soundness of a policy of caution in the outlay of money on high priced seed for a new and little known variety.

The Dominion Seed Act requires that all varieties introduced into Canada must be licensed in order to be sold for seed. A variety is licensed on the basis of experimental evidence which shows that the variety in question has some merit or is adapted to a particular environment. This fact, however, does not imply that because a variety is licensed for sale in Canada it can be recommended to replace standard sorts in any section of the country but rather that the variety is one that is promising and would warrant further trial in order to establish more definitely its general usefulness.

Experimental institutions, whether Provincial or Federal, will always be glad to assist a grower in his choice of a variety and will offer an opinion on the probable results or demerits of a new variety.

It was the small girl's birthday, and as a present her aunt in the country sent her a pincushion. "Now darling," said her mother, "you must write and thank auntie."

So the child obediently sat down and wrote the following: "Dear Auntie,—Thank you for your present. I have always wanted a pincushion, but not very much."

REVIEW OF THE WEEK IN THE ONTARIO LEGISLATURE

Premier Henry Makes Slashing Counter-Attack on Hydro's Foes—Mortgage Moratorium Discussed

BACKED by the thunderous support from government benches, Premier George S. Henry made a smashing counter-attack upon the critics of Hydro when speaking on Tuesday in answer to the Opposition speakers in the Throne Speech debate, developing the major Hydro battle in the present session. Parliamentary critics at the conclusion of Premier Henry's Speech declared it the soundest, most sincere, and aggressive address the Prime Minister has yet delivered. Through it ran a clear, sincere defence of Hydro, which he declared lived every day of ihs life, a statement that could not be made by Opposition critics, who had attempted to besmirch the names of the commission through unfounded argument.

Premier Henry challenged the Opposition to bring forward one fact that would prove anything in the nature of political interference with Hydro while he had been head of the Government or during the days of Hon. G. Howard Ferguson. Further he challenged D. Paul Munro, Liberal, South Wellington, through H. C. Nixon, Progressive Leader, who sought an election in the near future, to return to his riding and run again. Premier Henry even agreed to pay Mr. Munro's personal election ex penses.

Defending the commissioners, Premier Henry declared there had been a decided effort by Opposition members to "get" Sir Adam Beck during his Hydro regime, and he went so far as to say that the then Premier, Mr. Drury, would have dismissed Sir Adam if he had dared. The same methods to "get" Sir Adam, declared Premier Henry, were being proceeded with to-day in an effort to "get" the present commissioners, whom, he declared, are men of unquestioned integrity and ability.

"If we cannot have confidence in the men we appoint to our commission without all their affairs having to be investigated no man of any standing would take the position from us," said Premier Henry.

As to Hydro being political, Premier Henry asked Mr. Nixon to go back to the days of the Drury Government when Col. Carmichael, a member of that government, was placed on the commission as well as Controller Geo. Ramsden, of Toronto, whom, he added, was not a Conservative.

In connection with the request of Mr. Sinclair to have the $125,000 payment made by R. O. Sweezey to John Aird, Jr., in the Beauharnois contract, Premier Henry replied there had been no evidence that one dollar of it ever reached the Conservative party either in Ontario or any province in the Dominion. Premier Henry declared this money went into the hands of the man who gave evidence before the Beauharnois inquiry.

"Aird's evidence is accepted because he has proved the contribution is in his own hands," said Premier Henry.

Upon the policy of his government on the development of the St. Lawrence, Premier Henry read correspondence between former Premier Ferguson and then Premier King in 1928 in which the province demanded immediate action in the development. The King Government had then replied they were not prepared to do anything for Ontario at that time.

"We pressed for a solution time and time again," said Premier Henry, "and yet Mr. Sinclair says we have no policy with regard to the St. Lawrence. That is the reason we bought power from Quebec. It was because we had in Ottawa a government antagonistic to us and we were forced to buy elsewhere. I shall show that we are able to now make real progress through the present government we have at Ottawa."

Premier Henry declared in appointing the Middleton Commission to probe two specific questions of Hydro, it was not intended to proceed on a "fishing expedition," but Mr.Sinclair's motion to investigate seven Hydro power-purchase contracts was nothing else but a "fishing expedition." The Gregory commission appointed under the Drury government had been nothing but a "fishing expedition," costing over $500,000 and said at the end that Hydro was all right.

Taking a sly cut at The Toronto Globe, Premier Henry termed it a "little old lady at Yonge and Melinda streets," imagining she's Lady Macbeth and becoming distressed accordingly. The Globe's party was so bespattered with Beauharnois mud that the purpose was to besmirch all others.

In opposing Mr. Sincalir's motion, Premier Henry added: "for the simple reason that public ownership cannot survive, cannot thrive or live if the public of this province is to be continually roused with suspicions fostered by those who are opposed to Hydro.

Further evidence was given in the House that all is not harmony between W. E. N. Sinclair, Liberal House Leader, and M. F. Hepburn, M. P., Provincial Liberal Leader. The question arose when Mr. Nixon questioned the government for reason why the Opposition should not have counsel appointed by Justice Middleton in order to have status before the commisisoner's Hydro probe. Mr. Nixon received no support from Mr. Sinclair in the request, it later developing that Mr. Nixon and Mr. Hepburn had visited Justice Middleton with the request without having asked Mr. Sinclair to accompany them. Mr. Sinclair had previously planned to make the same request with Dr. G. A. McQuibban, Liberal, N.E .Wellington, but Messrs. Nixon and Hepburn had stolen a march on the opposing pair. Consequently, no alliance exists between Mr. Sinclair and Messrs. Nixon and Hepburn.

Replying, Premier Henry .said: "The investigation into Hydro by Mr. Justice Middleton has been and will be utterly divorced from politics and was not occasioned by the criticism of any political troup."

ONE OF THE FIRST government measures to be introduced in the House was the moratorium bill on mortgages, presented by Hon. W. H. Price, Attorney General, which was quickly given second reading and will likely become law within the next two weeks. The bill provides that proceedings of foreclosure, power of sale, or execution in other ways must be taken before a county judge who has complete power to decide upon what time shall be allowed on interest payments and principal.

In discussing the measure. Col. Price said: "The bill is intended to give some relief to people who are unfortunate in being unable to make payments on mortgages. No matter before the legislature has aroused as much public interest as this bill. When one tries to remedy a situation beyond one's control, many diverse factors enter into the situation, making the framing of extreme difficulty. It is a problem to give protection and yet not go too far."

FEEDING CHILDREN

GOOD eating habits have much to do with health, and such habits are of the greatest importance during the years of childhood, when the body is growing rapidly. In addition to knowing what to feed the child, we need also to know how to feed him.

Regularity in feeding is desirable. This means that the proper foods, having been selected and prepared, are to be served to the child at regular meal times.

If a child is to enjoy his meals, he should come to the table hungry and ready to eat what is set before him. The child who is given food between meals is not hungry at mealtime; he is not interested in his food, and so will likely refuse to eat.

The child who is both hungry and rested enjoys his meals. No one, child or adult, desires food when tired. Children should have a short period of rest before going to their meals.

Children are not all alike, nor do they feel just the same day after day. A child will be more hungry on some days than on others. It is not to be expected that all children of the same age will eat the same amount of food or that the child will want the same amount every day.

As long as a child is healthy and is gaining steadily in weight, his mother does not need to worry if he does not eat as much as her friend's child. She should not feel concerned if he does not get his full allowance every day.

Adults must remember that children imitate them. A child's dislike for some food can often be traced to some adult who has, by word or action, shown that he or she dislikes that particular food. If the mother and father do not eat certain foods, or if they show their dislike for some particular food, they set an example that the child will very likely follow.

Children demand attention, and the meal-time gives the child an excellent opportunity to attract attention to himself. If he parent is fussy, or scolds when the child does not eat, all the child has to do is to refuse to eat and he gets the attention he loves. That is one reason why it is better for the young child to eat alone, or with other children and not with adults.

New foods should be introduced to the child in small servings. The child should be told quietly that when he has taken the new food, he will have the remainder of his meal—the foods to which he is accustomed. If he refuses to eat, he should not be given anything else; above all, he should not be coaxed or scolded, nor should the parent show displeasure. Nothing should be given the child until the next meal. It will not do him any harm to miss a meal or two, provided he has plenty of water to drink. In this way he will become really hungry and will eat the new food. The child who refuses food is, in most cases, seeking attention.

Children should be taught to drink water between meals. It is a bad habit to drink a glass of water at the beginning of a meal, as this fills the stomach and destroys the appetite.

The cause of most difficulties in feeding is the result of irregularity of meals, feeding between meals, or a mother who is impatient or fussy and who shows her anxiety or anger to the child.

CYCLONE SALLY

SALLIE was fifteen years old and homely. Anyone who is fifteen or who ever has been fifteen will understand how she felt. Without glancing at the mirror, she brushed her red hair with swift, hard strokes and then braided and tied the ribbon with a jerk. She put on a fresh linen suit and was arranging her black tie in a carefully careless knot wehn the door opened, and her sister danced into her room.

"All ready, Sallie?' she asked. "Do I look all right? Oh, I do hope Aunt Alice will like me!"

"O Dorothy," groaned Sally, "of course you look perfectly peachy! I do believe you wore that pink on purpose to make me look more hideous by contrast."

Dorothy laughed good-naturedly. She was taller than Sallie and unusually pretty. "Come into my room and put some powder on your nose," she suggested. "I love you in that white and black; you look so cool."

"I look as ugly as anyone can, Dorothy Green, and you know it!" Slamming the door behind her, Sallie stamped out of the room only to run into her little brother Ted.

Seeing her flaming cheeks and grim mouth, he cried, "Hello, Cyclone Sallie! Can't you give a fellow time to hide in the cellar?"

Sallie swept past him with her nose in the air and walked majestically downstairs.

By the banister route Ted reached the foot of the stairs before she did. "Rally, dally, Cyclone Sally," he jeered, grinning up at her.

But his mother, calling from the veranda, cut his mocking short: "Ted! Sallie! Here they come."

In another minute an automobile swung into the driveway, and Ted and Sallie forgot each other in their eagerness to see their Aunt Alice. For hadn't Aunt Alice travelled all over the world? Hadn't she written the most thrilling accounts of the things she had seen? And now at last she had found time to make a flying visit to the California branch of the Green family. She had planned to stay exactly one week. Always there had been lovely gifts from Aunt Alice at Christmas and on birthdays surprise gifts from strange lands. She had always seemed a delightful sort of fairy godmother.

And here she was at last, springing out of the car before Mr. Green had a chance to help her. As she hurried up the path Sallie's heart sank, and she hung back behind the others. For Aunt Alice was very beautiful. She was almost as tall as Sallie's father, and her complexion was as clear and rosy as Ted's. Sallie had secretly hoped she might be a trifle sallow or angular.

Sallie was the last one that Aunt Alice greeted. Her aunt kissed her and then held her at arm's length, and gazed at her; Aunt Alice's brown eyes were glowing softly. Sallie returned her look a bit defiantly.

"Why didn't anyone ever tell me, Tom," Aunt Alice cried to Sallie's father, "that she is my little-girl self of twenty-five years ago?"

Sallie gasped.

"For fourteen years," Mr. Green replied, "I have been saving this moment as a surprise for you, Alice. Before Sallie could even walk her mother and I saw the resemblance."

Sallie was dazed, and as soon as she could she stole away to examine her reflection in the mirror. No, they were all mistaken! There were the same too heavy black eyebrows drawn together in a frown, the same freckled nose and the same large mouth. To be sure, her hair and eyes were almost the colour of Aunt Alice's but there was this plain difference: Aunt Alice was beautiful, and she was ugly!

"Sallie! Cyclone Sally!' 'called Ted from the doorway. "Mother wants you to help her put supper on the table."

"Cyclone Sallie!" The name suited her; much as she despised it, she knew that it did. She whirled and caught Ted firmly by the shoulders and shook him hard. One thing was certain, Aunt Alice must not hear that name. It was entirely too descriptive. "Ted," she pleaded. "Ted, if you won't say Cyclone Sallie again for a whole week you may have my—tennis racket."

"For keeps?"

"Yes, that's what I meant. But not till the week is gone and you've held your tongue!"

"All right, Cy—I mean Sallie." Ted knew she always kept her word; there was no trouble about that, and the racket was a beauty.

"But say," Ted asked, "are you going to make Aunt Alice think you are a goody-goody? What's the use? You're sure to fly off the handle. You always do!"

Sallie eyed him scornfully, but her cheeks were red. "Do you think I can't act any way I choose—for one week? Watch me!"

As she helped put supper on the table she hummed softly—which was not in the least like Sally.

By the time supper was over Sallie realized that Aunt Alice was more wonderful than a fairy godmother, and she was sure that to gain her approval would be worth a mighty struggle. She wished vaguely that she were not only as pretty as Dorothy but as gentle and lovable. Sallie was too honest not to give her sister full credit for her good qualities. For this one week she determined to imitate them.

She insisted on washing the dishes by herself, and she joined the group on the veranda just in time to hear Aunt Alice say, "And then I shall take one of you girls with me to Los Angeles for a week perhaps. We'll spend a couple of days at Long Beach. Do you swim, Sallie?"

"I swim like a fish! Oh, how I'd love it!" cried Sallie, and then her face flushed a crimson red. "One of the girls," she repeated to herself. Of course Aunt Alice would choose Dorothy. And it was rude to be fairly begging to be the one. Sallie thought quickly. "But Dorothy," she continued at once, "has the prettiest blue bathing suit; it deserves a trip to the beach."

Then Sallie gave her sister such a radiant smile that Ted giggled. He had remembered Sallie's advice that he watch her.

During the days that followed it was a strange, subdued Sallie that smilingly arose each morning and went about the house, acting so sweet and thoughtful that Dorothy's accustomed gentleness was almost unnoticeable. She had out-Dorothied Dorothy!

"What's the matter with you, Sallie?" her father asked one evening as she came out on the porch. "You've been so quiet lately that I hardly know you."

"I think," said her mother, "she's not been out of doors enough. You see she's insisted on helping me so much with the work—so I'd have a chance to visit more with Alice."

"Good girl," said her father. Then he noticed her racket. "Goin~ to play tennis?"

"Sallie," shouted Ted, rushing into the yard, "let me take your racket to-night? The week's half up anyway."

Sallie was frightened. What would Ted say next? Her eyes flashed threateningly, but she tossed the racket to him.

"See here, Ted," said her father, looking in amazement at Sallie, "your sister intended to play."

But Sallie shook her head. "Let him have it. He's buying it on the instalment plan anyway." She laughed. "Come on, Dorothy, let's go down to the library."

That evening Aunt Alice told of her decision. She wanted to take Sallie with her.

After Sallie had gone to bed she lay for a long time, looking out at the stars. In the next room she could hear Dorothy moving about restlessly. How disappointed she must feel. Once Sallie thought she heard a muffled sob. "Well," she said to herself. "I earned this trip. Certainly I never worked so hard for anything before."

Yet she didn't feel quite so joyful as she had expected. If Dorothy had only acted a little spiteful! But instead she had seemed almost pleased and had offered to let Sallie take the blue bathing suit. Was it hard like this all the time for Dorothy to act nice? All at once the truth flashed upon Sallie, and she sat up very straight. Dorothy didn't merely act nice; she was nice! And she- Cyclone Sallie, who had always prided herself on her honesty, was taking a reward for being a hyprocrite!

There was only one day left. Could she do it? Could she stop acting and let Aunt Alice see what she really was? It would be hard, harder even than it had been to act so sweet and kind, but she would do it. She must if she were going to keep her self-respect.

Before six o'clock Dorothy was vaguelv aware that Sallie was up and moving round. She heard the bathroom door slam and heard Sallie whistling a little off key while she splashed in her cold bath. A few minutes later she heard a shriek from Ted's room: "Ouch—help—ow! Sallie, you quit!"

"Get up then, cry-baby," came Sallie's jubilant voice. "I've saved you the trouble of bathing, haven't I?"

Then came sounds of a scuffle, more slamming of doors, and then ominous silence.

Sallie never did anything by halves. Firm in her determination to reveal her real self to Aunt Alice, she had resolved to be more fiery, to give way to more "tantrums" than ever before, to make up for her ladylike, though very un-Sallielike, attempt of the preceding days. But never did a youth who had resolved on a career of crime meet with such disheartening obstacles. In the first place it seemed that no one would do the slightest thing to provoke her temper. In the second place she felt so ashamed of her hypocrisy, as she called it, that she almst thought of the rest of her family as saints. Still the Cyclone Sallie that Aunt Alice must see always lost her temper, and an exhibition she must give.

Just before noon when her mother came downstairs with an armload of Sallie's clothes Sallie saw her chance.

"Sallie," said her mother, "I'm going to look over your clothes and see that all the buttons are on and that everything is ready for your trip. If you'll try on this green gingham—I think perhaps I ought to let down the hem."

Sallie took her time about answering. The thought of Aunt Alice's horror and of her mother's shame at what was about to happen filled her with despair—but she had to do it.

"It's a pity," she replied, taking up the green dress and scowling at it, "that I never have a decent rag. You see," she went on, turning to Aunt Alice, "Dorothy, being the beauty of the family, has all the pretty clothes."

"Why, Sallie!"

"And of course,' 'Sallie continued implacably, "our lovely Dorothy gives them to me after the new is worn off. This gingham was hers last year." She slipped the dress over her head. "Mother," she complained, "I had hoped that you'd buy me something decent to wear on the train, but sweet Dorothy says that my old tan suit is 'quite the thing.'" She mimicked Dorothy's voice and shrugged her shoulders in a disagreeable way.

"It looks very well, dear," said her mother soothingly. "You might rip this hem out, Sallie, and after lunch—"

"Don't 'dear' me!" cried Sallie. "I'll do no such thing!"

Snatching the dress off, she flung it on the floor and stamped on it. "I'll not go to Los Angeles looking like an old rag doll' I'll not go! If Aunt Alice had chosen to take Dorothy or Ted, there'd have been a different tune."

Just then Sallie caught sight of Ted; he was standing in the doorway and was gazing at her in horrified amazement.

"Well, you poor angel-face," she snapped, "why are you staring at me like that—you—you young idiot!"

"Sallie, you may go to your room," said her mother sternly.

Sallie went out and banged the door behind her.

No one called her to luncheon, but after a long time her mother came with a dainty tray and rapped at her door.

"Who is it?" asked Sallie in a very little voice and then sprang to open the door. "Oh, mother," she said apologetically, looking at the tempting lettuce salad, the creamy milk, and the substantial ham sandwiches.

Her mother set the tray on the table by the window and began to talk as if nothing unusual had happened. "I thought you might be hungry. And, Sallie, Dorothy says that at the stores they have marked down their spring suits. You and I will go right down and if!"

"But, mother," Sallie interrupted her, "my clothes are good enough."

"But, Sallie—" her mother began.

"Oh, I'll have to explain the whole thing. When I saw Aunt Alice I decided to make her think I was good and dear like Dorothy, and then when she chose me I saw what an awful hypocrite I'd been—just as if I'd sneaked into a baby show and taken a prize. So I thought I'd have to let Aunt Alice see how cranky I am. And now she can take Dorothy. I'm glad it's over with."

"But Sallie," her mother assured her, "I don't think vou were a hypocrite just because you controlled your temper. How hard it must have been for you, child! I don't think it will ever be so hard as that again. I am proud of you for doing it."

"Why, mother, I don't believe you understand yet. I was just acting."

"It was more than acting, Sallie; it was thinking. Besides, do you know why Aunt Alice chose vou? Because Dorothy told her it was your turn. You know she went last summer."

"Oh," said Sallie, "that settles it. Dorothy will have to go, for I shall not!"

"But, Sallie," remonstrated her mother, "how will Dorothy feel after you were chosen?"

Sallie grinned. "I'll ask her," she said as she dashed out of the room. "Dorothee!" she shouted, clattering down the stairs. "Dorothee!"

When Sallie came back a few minutes later she made a swift attack on the tray. "We'll pack up some things, both of us, in your bag. May we? And at the last minute we'll draw straws."

Her mother looked a trifle worried. "Dorothy agrees?" she asked.

"We agree absolutely." Sallie reached for another sandwich "I'll tell Aunt Alice right now." Balancing the tray precariously on the tips of three fingers, she left the room, and her mother drew a sigh of relief.

Thursday, the day that Aunt Alice had set for her departure, began early for the Greens. Both Sallie and Dorothy were too much excited to sleep after daylight. Their father announced at the breakfast table that he wanted to take Aunt Alice for one more drive and promised to have her back in good time for the train. He asked their mother and Ted to go also. Dorothy and Sallie giggled a good deal and then disappeared upstairs.

When father stopped for them on the way to the station they were at the gate, waiting with their mother's beautiful bag. Even at the station, while their father and Aunt Alice went to buy the tickets, the girls had not yet drawn straws. So their mother had to give her final instructions to both of them, and when it was almost time for the train to go, and Aunt Alice was on the platform, they said good-bye.

At last the conductor called, "All aboard!"

Then their father fairly picked their mother up and swung her on the train. "You're the one who is going!" he exclaimed.

"We packed your things for you," cried Sallie exultantly.

"And my blue bathing suit will fit you perfectly," called Dorothy. "And we will draw straws—to find out who has to do the cooking!"

"Oh, no," cried mother, "I can't go. I must not!"

But Aunt Alice held her firmly by the arm. "Oh, but you must," she said. "It was all Sallie's idea, and she worked like a—like a cyclone to manage everything."

The train was moving.

Ted stood looking at Sallie in amazement, but in his heart there was sudden admiration for his sister. He knew how she had longed for the trip. "Cyclone Sallie!" he cried. "Did you hear her? Aunt Alice all but called you that herself."

"I keep my racket," replied Sallie. "The week isn't up till four o'clock."

Ted made a face and groaned but to himself he said, "Sallie is not the only one who can be decent!"

Sallie laughed; perhaps she understood, but she knew better than to say so. Her eyes were shining. Her lips were very red and smiling as she waved to her mother.

"Why, Sallie," said Ted, "you're almost good-looking!"
