To The Editor

Dear Editor:

We, as a group of of private citizens, invite other other citizens of Morrisburg, who are dissatisfied with the street names in the new Morrisburg, as they appear on the map, to submit alternate suggestions in writing to members of the Planning Board or Council at once.

The latest date for these suggestions is Monday afternoon. Monday night's Council Meeting will definitely decide onu the street names. Please state tthe reason for your choice.

It ie opr thought that many of those who have contributed to the actual building, the cultural or business develoopment of Morrisburg, might be so commemorated. The meeting on Thursday here, indicated changes might still be made providing changes were submitted at once.

Yours very truly,

(MRS.) ELEANOR MORGAN.

ED. NOTE:—The editor agrees most wholeheartedly with the above letter. While we have no axe to grind in the matter of the naming of the village streets,, we would consider it almost sacreligious were familiar family names sacrificed to the whims of planners, who might seek to honour present day "big shots" in the village as has been done in other localities.

The following names are suggested as worthy of being commemorated in new streets: Kyle, Allison, Farlinger, Allison, Whitney. No doubt other names will be suggested by local residents. Obviously we can't have them all. But it seems to us we could have better names than First, Second, Third, Fourt, Fifth, etc.

Dear Sirs— The Canadian Press ran a story on our loss of Rare Books from the Vatican Library, now sunk in the Andrea Doria. It is notable, as usual, for what it said wrongly, and failed to say at all. Thusly what little it did say, has no meaning to our 10,000 clients or to the Catholic Institutions far and wide and here at home, awaiting a chance to obtain a Vatican relic. Will you run it correctly, if so the other papers don't matter.

The Vatican Library, largest and oldest extant (I am Protestant) appointed us first and only Media to sell its rare books, for Charity Purposes, in its 500 year history. The first shipment for this year of over 100 truly rare books (world's first printings dated (AD 1475 to 1575) were sent registered mail a week befoore this half-witted Italian ship Andrea Doria sailed. Thusly we have suspected for three weeks it is lost and this is now confirmed by airmail from the Vatican.

These books were intended to open our ushal Fall Catalog Saale and was annoonuced long since. They range from Original First Editiotions ot Gallileo to Linneaus, to Erasmus, etc. One paper called them "Duplicates of Originals", a stupid phase of some beginner in newspaper work, conveying the belief these were reproductions. They were the ORIGINALS, one and all, otherwise the sale would be a usual trash sale.

More interesting to local Ontario Readers may be the fact that these were intended to help us officially op en what will be Canada's largest book store, on this new 8oronto - Montreal - Ottawa juncture point, so that all travelling hence may pause, if so wished, to examine and obtain in person, rather than await our annual 10,000 catalogues every three months. We will house some 100,0000 volumes on all subjects known to man and as the average city shop is considered large at 10,000 volumes ,it is rather unusual.

Thuslay my bitter feeling towards the dammend fools, who ouldn't, with $5 millions in instruments, sail thru a minor fog, without crashing into anything afloat.

Our Nova Saotia fishermen live and work in fog 365 days a year with a $10 foghorn. This Drunken Doria was out 5 days. Our boys stay out 5 weeks and still ome home on top of the water. My books were trusted to idiots in a Marine Brothel, so now repose at the bottom of the Atlantic.

Another reminder to those patrons of the Library who are not returning books much needed. As pointed out some time ago, when you do not return the books, our circhlation suffers and we are anxious, of course, tot make as good a showing as other Libraries the same size as ours. Your kind atátention to this would be appreciated.

INQUEST HELD IN HIGHWAY DEATH OF CLARE HOLLISTER

A coroner's jury inquiring into the highway crash in which Clare Hollister lost his life a few weeks ago, found last night that there were not sufficient signs guarding the excavation across highway 31, nor were the signs properly lighted.

Members of the jury were Leslie McCormick, foreman, Robert McKendry, Kenneth MacLuckie, William Mongor, George Tindal.

Presiding coronor was Dr. Charles A. Louden of Morrisburg, and Crown Attorney R. P. Milligan, Q.C., Cornwall, examined the witnesses.

The jury retired at 1020 p.m. and returned at 11.10 p.m. with the following verdict:

"Clare Hollister came to his death on the night of July 11th, 1956 at approximately midnight on Highway 31 in the Village of Morrisburg, when the car he was driving struck an open excavation across the highway at the new C.N.R. right of way. The cause of death was a broken neck, the result of the accident.

"We consider from the evidence submitted that there were not sufficient signs, nor were the existing signs and barricades lighted.

We recommend that in future, all barricades across highways be protected by adequate warning signs and that both barricades and the signs be properly lighted and serviced by signalmen on duty, especially at night".

WATERWORKS EXCAVATION CAVES IN, BUT NONE HURT CONSIDERABLE DAMAGE

No one was hurt in the cavin-in of the almost 50-ft. deep excavation at the site of the new Morrisburg pumping sattion, on Monday night. Fortunately no workmen were in the job at the time, on account of the Civic Holiday.

Although estimates of the damage were rather large at first glance, a later calculation was that damage would be less than at first believed, and that the accident would not materially affect theh finishing date of the construction.

The deep well was 23 feet wide and lined with steel sheathing, some of which collapsed in the cave-in.

Reconstruction work is being carried out by the Armco Drainage and Metal Products of Guelph, the contracting firm.

MRS. E. H. THOMPSON, DIES AT WILLIAMSBURG HOME

On August 4th, Mary Platt Johnston, widow of the late Edmund H. Thompson, passed away at the home of her son, D. Hugh Thompson, of Williamsburg, following an illness of three months.

Mrs. Thompson was born at Hanesville, Ontario, on December 31st, 1869 and was one of a family of seven children of the late Mr. and Mrs. John Johnston.

In 1891 she married Edmund H. Thompson and they continued to live in the community of their birth for forty-six years. She was an active member of the Presbyterian Church at Dixon's where for many years she sang in the choir, and was president of the W. M. Society and was also a life member of the local Red Cross Society and helped to organize the Matilda Women's Institute.

Since coming to Williamsburg, she became a member of the United Church, and was active in the W. M. Society, of which she was made a life member. She was also a member of the Women's Association and the Women's Institute of Williamsburg.

In 1951 Mr. and Mrs. Thompson celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary. Mr. Thompson predeceased her four years ago.

She is survived by one son, Hugh, of Williamsburg; and two daughters, Mrs. George W. Clements, of Lisbon, N.Y., and Mrs. E. A. Devitt, of Ottawa; and one sister, Mrs. Mattie Murray of Brockville. There are seven grandchildren: Mrs. Wm. B. Hull of North Royalton, Ohio, Wallace Clements of Midland, Texas, Paul Clements of Beverly, Mass., Mahlon Clements of Lisbon, N.Y., Major Hugh E. A. Aevitt of Ottawa and Dr. James E. Devitt of Ottawa and Donald Thompson of Williamsburg.

There are six great grandchildren.

The funeral service was held at the home of her son on Monday, August 6th and was conducted by her pastor, the Rev. George Dunlop. Mrs. Mary Cameron of Kitchener, Ontario, sang "Beautiful Isle", accompanied by Mrs. Maefred Merkley.

The pall bearers were four of her grandsons and two great nephews, Archie Johnston of Brinston and Parker Locke of Morrisburg.

Interment was in Spruce Haven Cemetery in Brinston.

The great number of lovely floral pieces and the host of friends from near and far who came to pay last respects to a beloved friend, testified to the high esteem which she had won in a long, good and useful life.

ANNE HIRST
Your Family Counselor

"Dear Anne Hirst: My in-law problem is different from others I've read. My parents are dead, and I have no relatives to help with my five-year-old girl except my husband's mother, who lives two blocks away. We are buying our home and my husband has taken on extra work to help out, so we can't even afford a sitter. We ask his mother to baby sit only about once every three months, and she always complains that it puts her behind in her housework or her sewing . . .

"Yet she minds my sister-in-law's children one day a week so she can go places, though there's a part-time maid there. I don't resent this, believe me, but I expect another baby in a month and I've been very sick; she has not offered to help out at all, she is even planning to be away the week I am expecting. This means my husband will have to take time out from work while I'm in the hospital, to look after our little girl.

"My friends and neighbors talk about my mother-in-law, and I try to cover up. She tells them and everyone here, how much she likes me, but why won't she prove it? If my own mother were living, how different things would be!

NOT UNUSUAL

In many a family, such favoritism exists because the older woman favors one son's wife and does not feel as close to another daughter-in-law. You probably do not know the cause of this, and it may even have started with your marriage; this and other factors are nobody's fault, and there seems nothing you can do about it. One would think that the coming emergency would inspire her to ease your husband's burden, but it seems this is not to be. You and he are concerned with practical details, so here are a few ideas that may be useful:

Confide your situation to your doctor, and ask him about the social service agency at the hospital you have chosen. Sometimes the Red Cross or similar groups take over if they can.

Can your husband arrange to take that week as part of his vacation, so he will not lose by it?

Isn't there a married couple with children among your friends or neighbors who would take your little girl for the week? They would not charge you, I am sure, and a little household gift is always proper expression of your gratitude.

Hereafter you will be wise to count your mother-in-law out for any help at all. Hope deferred is depressing to live with, so why hope any longer? She is as she is, and your plight does not move her. I am relieved that you do not resent your sister-in-law's luck (which would be natural) and I hope you make a point of being on friendly terms with her.

Your situation, deplorable as it seems, is not unique, I repeat. Accept it as permanent and use all your wit and practical common sense to manage as best you can.

HOME IS BEST

"Dear Anne Hirst: We have been married five years and have three wonderful children. Everything has gone beautifully for us all—until now, when I am so confused I'm almost crazy.

"Recently I met again a man I was in love with until my family made us part. I find I have never really gotten over him. What on earth am I to do?

CONFUSED"

Do what you know is right. You cannot separate your children from their father, nor can you deliberately leave him. The lives of you all would be blighted, and, as the cause of it, you would take on a terrific responsibility.

When we marry, we stop living for ourselves and begin living for others. We have no right to seek a new personal happiness when we know that others must pay for it. Tempted as you are, you will pray for strength to resist, and take on your rightful job as you must see it if you are being honest with yourself.

Being good may be dull for a while, but I know of no surer road to peace.

What Became of Mussolini's Millions?

When Mussolini, on the run, was planning his northward flight he drew a thousand million lire, then worth about $6,000,000, from the bank at Milan. He also took with him, according to the Italian press, treasure which included over a hundredweight of gold, sixteen million French francs, 200,000 Swiss francs, an unspecified amount in pounds sterling, both paper and gold, plus dollars, Spanish pesetas and Portuguese escudos.

The gold was not only in bars and pieces but scrap, some comprising gifts made by the Italians to the state treasury, including rings and all kinds of jewellery.

What happened to this vast treasure which was stored in the cars of the column held up by partisans first at Musso and Dongo, then at the Ponte del Passo? What became of important documents and other materials which Mussolini feverishly prepared and collected for his defence before any war-crimes tribunal he might have to face? All completely vanished. Their whereabouts is still a mystery.

Roman Dombrowski in "Mussolini: Twilight and Fall" says that Mussolini shared out part of the cash among his Fascist companions. "Renzo," the partisan who wrote an account of those dramatic last days before he, too, vanished, stated that the partisans found 18 million Swiss francs in Liverani's car, 36 million lire in Bombacci's, and 35 kilogrammes of bar gold in the possession of the alleged "Spanish ambassador," who could not speak Spanish and was thought to be Marcello Petacci, the brother of Mussolini's last mistress, who was to die with him.

The documents, which included the manuscript "That the Italians may know," were crammed into two cases, one of which Mussolini clung to as long as he was allowed, telling the partisans repeatedly to make sure it did not go astray, for it contained diplomatic papers of great value to Italy.

One was said to contain prewar correspondence between him and Sir Winston Churchill, and to have been the reason for Churchill's visit to Como soon after the end of the war.

The two cases were known to have been examined at Domaso, possibly in the villa of the rich Swiss, Luigi Hoffmann, in view of his contacts with partisan commander "Pedro" and his patronage of the 52nd Garibaldi Brigade which operated against Mussolini.

The political dossier was finally deposited in the Domaso bank, later taken out, and, according to a report, kept for a time in an old sarcophagus in a local church, then taken to General Cardona in Milan by two partisans, one of them "Pietro Gatti," who played a mysterious part in connection with the treasure. But it never reached Cardona.

"Renzo", who estimated the treasure's total value at 2,000 million lire, said it was all concealed in Hoffmann's villa, and immediately after Mussolini's death both the gold and currencies were sent to Como by car in a sealed chest. But it was reported that one of the escort shot the other in the back and vanished with the chest.

Pavolini, another Fascist, also had currencies in his car, and when it was brought to Dongo a crowd rushed to see it and some took "souvenirs." Consequently, only twelve million lire were found when it was searched. This sum "Petro" deposited in a local bank. But on the same night as the other murder a woman partisan connected with the 52nd Brigade went to the bank and took out the twelve millions to take it to the partisan higher command. She, too, vanished and her body was eventually found in Lake Como.

Some gold and currencies were concealed in the German cars with the column. When the Dongo partisans searched them they were chiefly concerned with checking the Germans' identities, and the discovery of Mussolini in a lorry caused some excitement and confusion. So when Major Kritz's column left Dongo it still held part of the treasure.

At Domaso two German naval officers from one of the lorries asked two women if there was any trustworthy person in the town whom they could consult. They were directed to Hoffmann's villa, where they handed him 33 kilogrammes of gold and 36 million lire. Feeling unsafe with so much wealth in his house, Hoffman transferred part of it to the 52nd Brigade's commander. "Pedro" deposited it in the Dongo bank, notifying his superiors.

On May 6th he was instructed to transfer it to the Como command, and the partisan entrusted with the message and the task of taking it there was this same "Pietro Gatti" (real name Michele Moretti), who gave "Pedro" a receipt for it. But "Gatti" failed to reach Como.

At the end of the following May "Gatti" was found in Milan. In view of the notoriety surrounding the treasure, he said he had thought it proper to hand it to some higher commander.

He never produced the receipt, and although the case was referred to the Italian police, to this day it is not publicly known what had happened to "Gatti," nor in whose name he acted.

Another partisan, Luigi Canali, known as Captain "Neri," was shot in the head on May 8. Evidently he was opposed to all this sleight of hand with the treasure, and was eliminated as a traitor.

After Mussolini's death a further document case was found at the Villa Mantero, Como, where his wife Rachele had stayed with the children. It contained documents and nineteen gem-studded Italian and foreign orders which had been conferred on him. This was the only treasure which fell into the hands of the state.

Italian public opinion believes that the rest passed into the Italian communist party coffers, which would explain the contradictory reports and stories put out to obscure the truth concerning Mussolini's death.

This book with its intrigue and drama is as gripping as any novel.

Great-Grandma Serves Dessert

While the preparation of soups, joints, and gravies is left to ruder and stronger hands, the delicate fingers of the lady of the household, are best fitted to mingle the proportions of exquisite desserts. It is absolutely necessary to the economy of the household that this art should form a part of every lady's education. For these reasons we offer this book to the public. It will be found useful both by the rich and by those of more moderate means; the common mistake of giving none but expensive receipts having been carefully avoided.

Before entering upon our main subject we think it will not be out of place to offer a few remarks on that very important subject, the arrangement of dishes with an eye to proper effect. On the style and elegance in which a dessert-table is spread, much of its success depends. In arranging the table, the greater number of handsome dishes and high stands that can be available the better, as glacés fruits, compotes, and confectionery look much handsomer when so displayed that they could possibly do in low or flat dishes. Vases of natural flowers tastefully interspersed throughout the table heighten the effect, and should never be absent. It is considered out of taste to mix cake, fruits, and bonbons on the same dish or stand: each kind should be grouped in its separate receptacle, and these alternated on the table according as taste will suggest.

Ices, of course, will be served moulded into pyramids or other effective forms; and there are numerous designs to be had which are highly artistic and ornamental for iced pudding, jellies, and blancmange, all of which will add beauty and elegance to the table. Even with the most minute directions we can give, the artist must rely, after all, on his own taste as to the proper disposition and grouping of colors, shapes and sizes; but a little experience will enable him to produce the finest effects, which will well repay the trouble and study it may cost. — From "The Dessert Book," by A Boston Lady, 1872.

Modern Etiquette...

Q. When one does not believe in the custom of tipping, isn't it one's privilege to omit it?

A. Although there is nothing compulsory about tipping, still a person who tries to omit it must be hard-shelled enough to shake off the black looks he will receive from those who have served him, and the possible accusations of "stinginess."

Q. When a young man accompanies two girls to the theater, is it all right for him to sit between them?

A. Yes, unless there is an aisle seat. Then he should, of course, sit next to the aisle.

Q. Does a man seat his woman dinner partner on his right or his left?

A. On his right.

Q. When a man invites another man to luncheon or dinner, should the host give the order for both to the waiter?

A. No; he should allow his guest to order first, and then give his own order to the waiter. When dining with a woman, she gives her order to him, and he orders for both.

Q. If one receives a written invitation that does not specify how long one is to visit as a house guest, should the letter of acceptance state it?

A. Yes; specify just how long you intend to stay.

A. For wiping the lips and the fingers. It is not for the cheeks, perspiration, or the nose. The napkin should be lifted as inconspicuously as possible, and lightly brushed across the mouth —and then replaced on the lap.

Q. Is it proper for a young man to give his mother's engagement ring to his fiancee?

Q. To whom does a bride address her letter of thanks for a gift which has been received from a married couple?

A. She writes to the wife and thanks both: "Thank you for the lovely present you and Mr. Smith (or Jack) sent me, etc."

Q. Is it proper to use the prefix 'Miss" on an envelope addressed to a girl of 12 or 14 years of age?

A. Yes.

Honeymooners Fooled Guests

Confetti and rose-petals showered one of the smartest streets in the West End of London as the handsome young engineer drove his bride away on their secret honeymoon. Blithely the wedding guests attached the usual "Just Married" placard to the car—but this time the laugh was on them.

Preparations for the lavish wedding reception — held in a luxury flat leased by the groom's firm — had given the bridal pair an idea. Quietly they rented a furnished flat in the same building.

While the guests were guessing where they had gone on their honeymoon, the happy couple drove around the block and re-entered by a side door. Their friends little realized that the newlyweds were next door but one in their first married home!

New-style honeymoons have underlined June bride news. In Glasgow kind-hearted Margaret Milsom cancelled her honeymoon travel plans and sent her widowed elder sister on a much-needed holiday instead.

Straight from the church, Margaret and her husband drove to the sister's house and began looking after the two babies. "It will help us make up our minds," said Margaret, "whether we're ready yet for bairns of our own."

In the same way a Cobham girl went straight home after her wedding and her eighty-year-old parents went off in the bridal car to catch a train for their second honeymoon.

Youth club leader Angus McGill faced a honeymoon dilemma when he fell in love with pretty Barbara Clift. He had promised his club members a coach trip to the Riviera and he didn't want to disappoint the boys and girls. Happily ,his wife agreed to share the honeymoon with the club members and so thirty-three youngsters went to the South of France with them!

Yet undoubtedly the most unusual honeymoon of the year will be that of blonde Josey Glanville. She and her husband, tall and handsome John Lowe, will share their bridal suite aboard ship with thirteen other people when they sail later this year.

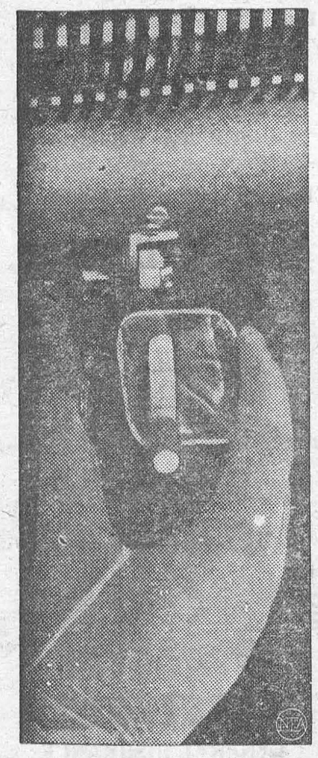
Josey and John are to cross the Atlantic in the replica of the Mayflower which has been built in Devon as a goodwill gift to the United States.

The original Mayflower took the Pilgrim Fathers to America in 1620 and the discomforts of sea travel in the frail 180-ton craft probably have not been repeated for 300 years. The passengers won't have separate cabins, for the pilgrims didn't. To complete the strangeness of the honeymoon atmosphere, Josey will wear typical Puritan attire—a long woollen gown.

NO RISK

'Well," said an insurance agent to newly-wed Angus, "now that you're married I'm sure you'll want to insure your life."

"Awa' wi' ye," replied Angus. "She's no' that dangerous."



POWER ASH TRAY — Latest gadget for the car dashboard is a vacuum ash tray that snatches away discarded cigaret stubs, extinguishes their fire and vacuum-packs them for future disposal. The vacuum power whisks away stubs and ashes through a tube into a sealed glass container which needs emptying only four times a year.

MAN BITES DOG—Here's that news-making feller you've heard about all your life. In this case, he's year-old Alton ("Fearless") Castel. Visiting in Chicago, he thinks nothing of nipping the ear of his host's pet boxer. The pooch didn't mind.

After Twenty Years—The Pay-Off

A Complete Story by Capt. Frank H. Shaw

"CALL it agricultural machinery," suggested the shifty-eyed man.

Captain Simon Carley nodded. "Where for?" he asked. Then whistled softly as the port of delivery was mentioned.

Twenty years of smuggling had robbed Carley of his conscience. He asked what the suggested fee might be, nodded when the handsome figure was mentioned.

The Stormy Petrel was well-named. She was a throw-out of the war: had been a fast mine-layer; and Carley's engineer was a genius. Between them they'd renewed her into something phenomenal.

Some of the turbulent Central American republics owed government changes to the comings and goings of the Petrel in the past. It was a sort of Piracy, but it paid. And Carley was ambitious; not so much for himself, but for his son, Dick, a lad of whom all who knew him had the highest opinion.

"He'll go far—be a credit to you," was the music Carley liked to hear. "Nothing he can't reach out for." And young Dick had had the saucy temerity to fall in love with a girl of whom Simon Carley thoroughly approved. She was an earl's daughter; a fine girl. A man needed money to keep such a girl in the state to which she had been accustomed. Carley went on making money, stacking it up, with that desirable end in view.

Dick was ambitius too; that's how he came in contact with Lady Aileen. He cut quite a dash in society.

Simon Carley oversaw the loading of his ship with a sense of satisfaction. It was a night-time job, naturally. Even in such a free port as Tangier, men didn't handle contraband openly. Though the packing cases were labelled Agricultural Machinery, anyone with half an eye could guess their contents were of a less harmless quality.

"All snug-oh?" asked the man with the shifty eyes, whom Carley knew for a go-between representing powerful interests.

"Right as rain. Cash down of course?" That was always a part of every such clandestine bargain. Nobody trusted anybody else in this underworld of intrigue. The negotiator had a suspicious bulge under his armpit. But Carley carried his gun even handier—up his sleeve; a neat little automatic like a toy that could yet account for seven if it came to a showdown.

If a man's hand made a suspicious movement, that little pistol dropped like magic into a skilled hand, and blazed forth in a trice.

"Sure!" said Mr. Hopolius. The money was tabled down, in U.S. notes of high value. Carley counted them swiftly. All correct. And at the handling of this good money, he felt the old spinal tingle that another riotous adventure was afoot A couple more runs like this one meant that Dick could offer a settlement on the girl of his choice, and that ought to clinch the deal, considering how present high taxation affected her noble sire.

"We'll pull out at midnight," Simon Carley promised; and was as good as his word. But the Petrel didn't advertise her departure. Tangier teemed with spies of one sort and another.

"Something's likely to happen," laughed Lt-Comander Hibbertson, R.N., commanding H.M.S. destroyer 'Ultra-rapid'. "Keep your eyes open, watch-keepers. Regular radar-watch." But there was a radar watch aboard the "Petrel" too. Whenever anything suspicious showed on the screen the skipper made quick calculations, stopping engines to do so. It was a kind of ghostly duel between two opposing forces. Better to run away than to risk detection and search!

Carley enjoyed this blind man's buff recklessly; he had a feeling that he was gambling with fate for the small fortune that should put his son on velvet. That roll of American currency was stowed away where even a customs man couldn't find it. If it came to a showdown he was quite ready to dump his cargo over the side—the cases were the size that could he easily handled; and they were ballasted with rocks that would sink them hurriedly. No need to worry!

But he felt his stomach turn over when a sharp flash of light showed on his starboard quarter. It was quite a while be the dull boom beat up against the light wind. If ever a signal to "Heave-to or I'll sink you!" challenged a man it was then. But the searching finger of light missed the 'Petrel'. She was already zigzagging smartly.

The flash astern, showed again, the dull echo boomed coaxingly through the ebony gloom. There was no moon; Carley knew his work, and had arranged the run for precisely this part of the month. But he heard the high pitched whine of a shell, which meant the pursuer was firing by radar, not by sight.

"One of these damned up-to-the-minute fellows," he scoffed to his Number One. "Give her the whole works!"

The 'Petrel' began to fly; and the questing destroyer hadn't a look-in once her throttles were thrown wide open. It was an exultant victory for a man who dared to take a risk.

Long before the first crack of dawn a light flickered ahead. Carley stopped engines, the 'Petrel' grew quiet as a wraith. In a lapping stillness, row boats floated up like shadows, hooked on alongside, and the noiseless cargo-gear got busy. Case after case was winched up from the holds, swung out, received. Boat afted boat, laden gunwale deep, stole stealthily away.

With the last parcel of cargo transhipped and receipts given and taken, the 'Petrel' smoothly turned about and ran at easy speed for a distant island Here she collected barrels of grapes and such-like truck. Her alibi established, she headed for open water and started her return to Tangier.

All the destroyers in creation could find fault with her! One lean greyhound did hoist a flag signal demanding immediate halting; a trim naval lieutenant came aboard. Whatever his suspicions might have been they had no foundation. He had a cask or two of harmless fruit opened for his inspection.

"Is there any need to use a forty-knotter to cart muscatels around the Mediterranean, skipper?" he smiled. "A bit extravagant. Oh, all right — clean bill. Be careful though—

Then the 'Petrel' resumed her placid voyage.

"Where to this time?" asked Carley once he'd handed the receipts over to Mr. Hopolous.

"Yankee cigarettes for Genoa," he was told. "We've got a tip to go cannily for a while."

"Suits me." The pay wasn't so good, but far from negligible, and the risk enough to breed pleasurable excitement. Carley carried his earnings to an international bank, and remitted them home. He asked for letters. Only one awaited him—from his wife. It held scanty scanty news, except that Dick, having taken a good degree, still had to do his National Service.

But Carley had a bit of influence here and there, on account of favours done. It would be all right; Dick would be a conscript, but he'd be taken care of. A nice cushy clerking job could be arranged as easy as winking. He wrote to various addresses to that effect, and loaded up with contraband cigarettes with a light heart,

This time he had only the Italian coastguards to cope with, and they were easy. He ran the 'Petrel' clean into Genoa harbour under night's shadow, and daringly tied up at an obscure pier. His luck held good; three trips he made without so much as scratching his paint.

"Care to try to run a final load of agricultural stuff?" Mr. Hopolous asked in the Tangier hotel where a hardworking seaskipper was entitled to take his ease after a job well done.

"Don't mind a try. Same rate?"

"Higher. Risk's increased so the pay-off's even bigger. They want the stuff so badly they'll give anything that's asked How about a drink?"

Hopolous clapped hands for the waiter and ordered lavishly. A man seated near-by threw down a well-read newspaper; and an outsize headline drew Carley's attention. He reached for the newspaper with a bit of a chuckle.

"Cyprus Terrists Strike Again," he read. Then one name leaped out at him as if limned in fire. "One British soldier shot and killed, seven others wounded," he read, his mouth parching. ". . . . Private Richard Quentin Carley, Army Pay Corp., shot from behind while returning to camp. The assassin was fatally wounded by return fire. The weapon was probably part of a cargo landed a short while before. . . ."

"Something wrong?" asked Hopolous.

"Everything!" gulped Carley. As his hand dropped from his glass the tiny automatic found his palm. He pulled the trigger; then slumped back in his chair. It didn't matter—what did anything matter with Dick murdered almost by his own father's hand?—From "Tit-Bits'.

The Big Knife

Bitter-sweet is the secret love story of Marie Antoinette, the lovely Queen of France, and intensely romantic the story of the package of mysterious letters, found long after her death.

Poets wrote odes to Marie Antoinette's beauty. A painter's fancy led him to place her portrait in the heart of a full-blown rose. But these mysterious letters, with their burning messages, were vastly different from the vapid compliments of the elegant, superficial court. Every word seemed charged with passion and devotion.

Each letter was written with so perfect a discretion that a stranger might have read them and been none the wiser. Why should Marie Antoinette lock them away with her jewels and her most secret papers, regarding each letter as a jewel in itself?

Perhaps even a queen finds solace in the knowledge that one person loves her in the world, and Marie Antoinette may have tenderly repeated a name over and over to herself in the dark watches of the night.

Count Axel Fersen! Count Axel Fersen!

The signature of the letter came back to her as she sat in the gardens of the Louvre, in the moonlight, while musicians made sweet music and all Paris clustered outside the gates.

It must have seemed a mad world to Marie Antoinette on the day when she looked from her windows at Versailles to see red fires flowing in the courtyard, sinister shadows surrounding them and, outlined by the flames, the crooked caps of the revolutionaries. Then a pageboy came running to her, with a strangely imperative note from Count Axel Fersen.

"I beseech you to see me. You are in grave danger!"

"Bid your master know the Queen of France is never in danger," Marie Antoinette cried in imperious tones.

Hardly had she spoken than a roar came from the courtyard, the sudden clash of steel against steel. In that instant, too, the tapestry against the wall was thrust on one side and a man stood there.

"Madame — Majesty — at your service! I regret the necessity for this intrusion. You are alone?"

"And you are Count Axel Fersen?"

There was no need of answer. He was tall, fine and manly, and his eyes sombre.

"I beg you to place a cloak around you ma'am. There are secret passages and byways. Your sentries cannot withstand this mob."

"Yet there are many men to guard the Queen of France."

"At present," he answered, "there is only one man to guard the woman I love."

His arms were about her as his cloak encircled her shoulders. His eyes, glowing and strange, looked deep into hers.

"I cannot leave my husband my children," she whispered.

He paid no heed. "This door, Ma'am. We shall cheat them."

She was still reluctant, and he half-carried, half-pulled her.

He closed his eyes, stooped, kissed her hand. "I am at your service, Majesty — but remember!"

Did she remember? As the royal carriage returned to Paris that fatal dawn, the mob about it, as she looked in fear from her window and saw the heads of her former guards borne aloft on pikes, did she see Count Axel following not far behind? When she heard from her ladies that the rioters had stabbed her mattress and set fire to the hangings in attempts to find her hiding place, she knew that the Count had saved her life.

The first wave of revolution rolled away. Marie Antoinette and Louis XVI were again in Paris, in the palace, in comfort, comparatively unperturbed — but still came those gentle letters from Count Axel Fersen, and still Marie Antoinette, reading between the lines, could trace the aspirations of an undying love.

The storm was again rising fast when he once again offered her escape, this time for her husband and children as well as herself.

And at midnight two hooded children, with a thick-set figure and a lady in a gipsy hat, entered the waiting coach and were driven away. Rattle, rattle over the cobbles of Paris—but was this the right way? Flurried by the occasion, the courier had turned left and not right. Valuable minutes were lost before he could retrace the way.

Outside the gates the Count was waiting. They were late. Had they been discovered?

Long past the appointed time the refugees arrived. The Queen, safe after perils, gave him a smile before she entered the second carriage. The children followed, and lastly the king.

But the sleeping Paris was awakening and enemies were coming fast behind them. Marie Antoinette, jogging and swaying in the carriage, did not know that overnight, during this adventure, her hair was whitening.

At a distant village another coach was waiting and horses ready ordered. It was the work of an instant for the royal party to change coaches and for Fersen to bow in a lowly, silent adieu.

In the dewy dawn the postilions vaulted into the saddles and were off — and with them went the Queen. But it already too late to do more to serve them when the next news reached the Count. The flight of the royal party was discovered due to that wrong turning in Paris. The coaches were turned back at Varennes.

It was another dewy dawn, and this time a different coach carried Marie Antoinette and the King over the cobbles of Paris while the streets were hushed and still. There were only beating drums and a double row of troops all along the road, men and women hushed behind them. A braggart cried, "Down with tyranny!" and Marie Antoinette looked up at a tricolour streamer blowing from a housetop.

She faced the guillotine with courage enough; her head fell; the executioner showed it to the people.

And to Count Axel Fersen that evening was brought a packet containing a lock of hair and the words, "In remembrance from one who has not forgotten —Marie Antoinette."

PUT ANOTHER TWOPENCE IN — It's the world's oldest jukebox with a built-in brass section. Ann Dunn holds a kingsized record for the "polyphon," made in Leipzig, Germany, over 120 years ago. The polyphon still produces music for patrons in a London, England, restaurant. When a coin is deposited in the side of the machine, the brass disc rotates, striking keys in music-box fashion.

TABLE TALKS

by Jane Andrews.

Easy to carry and satisfying to eat — that's sandwiches!

Fillings, of course, are what give variety, interest, and an element of adventure to the two slices of bread that enclose them. Whatever fillings you use, remember these simple pointers for making your sandwiches better. Use softened butter for easier spreading; spread to the very edges of both slices of bread to keep fillings from soaking into the bread.

Be generous with fillings — a skimpy sandwich hasn't a friend in the world! Have your fillings moist and well flavored, but do not have them oozy, ever. If you are using lettuce, wrap it separately and add it at the very last minute. Wrap garnishes also — crisp carrot and celery strips, ripe and stuffed olives, pickles, etc.

Do you know the difference between resin and rosin The resin is the crude turpentine exuded by various pine, fir and larch trees, which is distilled to separate the oil of turpentine from the solid matter. The solid matter that remains is called rosin. It comes in hard, brittle lumps and has many industrial and other uses.

Garden Party At Buckingham

Garden parties at Buckingham Palace have been much democratized since World War II. But they still retain an atmosphere quite out of the ordinary.

This applies right from the time the invitation arrives in a large white envelope with the royal crest on it and a postmark which reads "Lord Chamberlain, St. James's Palace."

The card inside is very grand and has the rather surprising inscription: "The Lord Chamberlain is commanded by Her Majesty to invite you to attend a Garden Party at Buckingham Palace (weather permitting)."

Use of this word "command" conjures up a picture of the Queen in stern mood, like the Queen of Hearts in Alice in Wonderland. One imagines her sitting at her desk biting the end of her pencil and saying to a timid and worried Lord Chamberlain, "See that you get those Lynes along to the party this year," writes Peter Lyne in "The Christian Science Monitor.

When the Lynes received their invitation they put it in the center of the mantelshelf for all to admire. Mrs. Hall, the daily help, admired it most of all. In this same week she had been marrying off her daughter and was inclined to go sentimental over invitation cards. Unfortunately while she was fondling our card she somehow let it slip down a crack between the mantelshelf and the fireback.

The Lynes, having just moved into a new house, have been so busy fixing their new garden that they haven't yet got around to doing all the jobs inside the house which should be done.

So here was a nice kettle of fish, as the London cockney would put it. It just wasn't possible to regain the invitation card short of a major building operation to remove the whole fireplace. It is well-known that the Palace authorities are most unwilling to provide duplicate invitations.

But it then dawned on us that there had been something else inside the Lord Chamberlain's envelope beside the invitation. Yes, sure enough, tucked away inside a large yellow car-park sticker there were two separate admission cards to be given up at the Palace Gates.

It was all the pleasanter after this adventure to be walking through the Palace Gates with crowds of watching Londoners pressed against the railings. We joined a long queue in the courtyard which was threading its way through the hall and through a magnificent reception room out onto the great lawns.

We started to admire the ladies' creations. The men were mostly in tail coats and gray top hats. But there were lounge suits too. And some wonderful attires from the colonial empire. A trade union leader from Africa, for instance, was arrayed in what looked like a green bathrobe and a straw hat with a huge peacock feather in it. We were told that there were more visitors from the Commonwealth among the 8,500 guests than there were Britons.

It was fun when we met a friend who said, "That's a smart tail coat of yours — looks like a Savile Row cut." It was fun because the coat happened to come from the United States in a wartime "Bundles for Britain" parcel. It belonged to a kindly lecturer with commendable foresight. At the time it didn't appear to have much connection with the war. But in the end it has given tremendous satisfaction to a grateful Londoner.

The practice at Palace garden parties is for the guests to form into several long avenues on the lawns. Down these avenues saunter the various members of the royal family accompanied by gentlemen ushers who introduce a celebrity here, a debutante there. From time to time the Queen or the Duke of Edinburgh, or the Queen Mother or Princess Margaret, or Princess Alexandra take the initiative themselves to chat with someone they recognize.

Bands play; the lawns are green and velvety soft; the flower beds are a picture; there is a pane of glass wants fixing in one of the greenhouses just to make one feel more at home; the royal wheelbarrows are painted in pastel tints but have no royal crest on them. The refreshments are most wtlcome.

While waiting in the avenue down which the Queen Mother was walking we were told an amusing story about that much loved royal figure. The story was about curtsying.

The Queen Mother, it seems, was inspecting a girls' gymnasium class. The instructress was remarking apologetically that curtsying in gym briefs must look rather silly to Her Majesty.

"Don't worry about that," said the Queen Mother. "You should have seen what happened when I was fishing for salmon in the River Dee one day. I came across a lady in waders fishing near the opposite bank. She felt it necessary to curtsy to me — with disastrous results."

When the Queen Mother came our way and all the ladies curtsied, I had a job to stop bursting out with laughter at the thought of that story.

IN MEMORIAM

O'SHAUGHNESSY — In loving memory of a dear Husband and Father, Mr. C. D. O'Shaughnessy, woh departed this life August 14th, 1955.

Somewhere back of the sunset,
Where loveliness never dies,
He lives in the land of glory
With the blue and gold of the sky.
And we who have known and loved him
Whose departure has brought sad tears,
We'll cherish his memory always
To brighten the passing years.
