Maple Leafs in Scoring Spree Trounce Mille Roches 8-2

Taking the breaks and outplaying their rivals most of the way, Chesterville's Maple Leafs trounced the Mille Roches Orioles in their first appearance here 8-2, Monday evening, in the C.O.V. Intermediate league. The visitors went into the lead early in the first, but the Leafs soon caught up and were not headed again during the evening.

Mille Roches made the trip to town in the heavy storm that swept this district along with the rest of Eastern Canada. Held up by the blow that made visibility nil at times, the coach did not reach Chesterville until after nine o'clock. A fair crowd of fans braved the blast to watch the Leafs take their first win in five games, the last two starts being ties with Finch and Maxville.

Merpaw scored both goals for the Orioles on lone sallies through the entire Chesterville outfit, taking his first at six minutes in the first and the second at 4.30 in the middle session.

Bic Fulton added three goals to his list, and Bud Fyke notched two. The other three Leaf goals were taken by Pud and Dob Plantz and Dwayne Munro. Pro Alford gave the assist on each of Fulton's three goals, while Wes. Loughridge also earned three points on assists. The only other point was taken by Lorne Marcellus who gave the pass to Munro for the final score.

The first period went without a penalty, but 14 convictions were made in the rest of the game, seven in each of the last two periods, the penalties also being evenly divided between the two teams. Featherstone appeared the bad mad for the Orioles as he made three trips to the timers.

A minor fight broke out in the second when Del Robinson, making his first local appearance with the Leafs, tangled with "Old John" Cross as he made a rush on the Mille Roches net. Del went down and came out of it with a nasty gash on his head from John's stick, and both received minor penalties. Dwayne Munro and Featherstone were also sent off for mixing it up in the second.

Shortly after the start of the third, Hubert Harper was given the gate for upsetting Merpaw, and then "Moose" Moore and Pud Plantz went to the bench for barging at each other, and the Leafs played three men to four. Later, Bub Plantz, youngest of the three brothers, and Bic Fulton followed each other in quick succession for bringing John Cross down at the boards, but even then with the advantage of two men, and playing five forwards, Mille Roche could not dent the nets behind Jim Fyke.

The teams:

MORE THAN THE LANDSCAPE WAS SNOWED UNDER

Yes, the visiting Mille Roche Orioles were snowed under with rubber on the ice as well as having a hard time trying to see enough of the road to get to Chesterville.

They have yet to make their first win, and the other three teams have been pulling away with four-point wins. The double-point games end with the Leafs' visit to Mille Roche Wednesday night. The last part of the schedule will see all teams on a two-point-a-win basis.

* * * *

Most of the fans thought John Cross had packed his hockey duffle years ago as he played with Chesterville on the old open-air rink, and they were surprised to see him step out with the visiting youngsters.

* * * *

The fans who waded through the drifts to see the game certainly gave the local kids a heartening sight. Nobody expected to see more than a corporal's guard, but Doc Hutt was pleasantly surprised when he finished counting the receipts.

* * * *

The storm played havoc with the stoves at the east end of the rink. The office and visiting team's quarters were "blackened out" and the players were given the ladies' dressing room. The office warmers had to go without heat.

* * * *

Del Robertson, who played here last winter, joined the Leafs for the Maxville game last Friday when he helped the boys pull a 3-all tie out of the bag by his second goal with but ten seconds of play remaining.

* * * *

Del worked well Monday night, and the experience he and Wes Loughridge have had will be a great help to the kids getting away to their first year of heavy competition.

* * * *

The game was interesting despite the lop-sided score, and Mille Roche should have had more goals as they worked into scoring positions several times. They should have done something in the last period when they had a two-man advantage for almost two minutes and five forwards doing duty.

* * * *

Luck was against Pro Alford, too, for he was set up no less than four times in a row in the first period, but couldn't get the puck near the net. His last shot went over the top.

* * * *

Dupuis in the nets, and Tillie Donihee, Moose Moore and Merpaw, all of Cornwall, are lined on the Oriole roster, and all gave good account of themselves, but many of the fans still can't see why Mille Roche hasn't got a winning combination.

Leafs Won Again Last Night From Mille Roches by 2-1

Chesterville Maple Leafs brought their total numbers of points earned this past week up to nine with a 2-1 victory over the Mille Roches Orioles on the latter's ice last night. Mille Roches went down here 8-2 on Monday night, and last night's loss made the sixth straight for the river boys since their belated entry to the C.O.V. Intermediate league.

Cecil Plantz slammed home Bic Fulton's rebound in the first period, and both teams counted in the second. Robinson, assisted by Loughridge, tallied for the Leafs, and Tillie Donihee made the lone Mille Roche counter about halfway through the session.

The game was fast and exciting with continuous end-to-end rushes and Mille Roches put up a much better game than on their appearance Monday night, and this marks the closest score of their games so far.

The Leafs found the roads in first-class shape, much better than Mille Roches did on their visit here when they came through the raging blizand didn't get home until three o'clock Tuesday morning.

Terrific Blizzard Hits District Blocking Up All Highways

During Monday night, one of the greatest snowstorms to strike this district in 25 years filled streets and highways with more snow than has been seen here in a long time. The storm, from the north-east, increased steadily during the afternoon of Monday until about midnight when the roads became impassable for motor traffic.

King street, from the Square back to the station, had about three feet of snow on the level and banks towering more than six feet high in the business section. With a gang of men and trucks working, conditions are becoming normal as the snow is being drawn away and dumped on the river ice.

It may have caused discomfort to some, but not to the youngsters who have had a wonderful time.

"PRIZE PICTURE" RACKET STOPPED BY SUDBURY POLICE

LAST WEEK, the old "prize picture" game was called to a halt when a couple of alleged operators were picked up at Sudbury. Working on a mother's pride in her offspring, it is few places that have not been worked on this "skin game," but the case of Mrs. Julia Boivin, of Noelville, near Sudbury, was a particularly cruel instance of the fraud. Mrs. Boivin, who is a 66-year-old widow, alleged that more than $3,300 had been swindled from her savings by the "picture rackateers." Some of this money was actually paid by cheque and by cash, and some of it was gained by members of the ring "raising" her cheques for comparatively small amounts to much larger figures. Mrs. Boivin said that one of her cheques for $18 had been raised to $1,800. The men, she said, had returned on several occasions telling her they needed more money to put through pictures which they had received from her, to art exhibitors in New York City, Chicago and Montreal. Mrs. Boivin said that one of the gang had one day showed her a cheque for $6,300, which she was given to understand was eventually to be paid to her for a prize for her picture.

The widow also stated she had been told that one of her pictures had made good in New York and she would, in due course, receive a prize of $16,000, but she had never received anything.

This racket has bobbed up here at different times, but usually the victims for comparatively small amounts have not divulged the matter until they could take it more or less as a joke.

The counties' road system, according to Superintendent Cameron is slightly in excess of 463 miles with Mountain Township having 33.8 miles, Matilda 43.2 miles, Winchester 26.35, Williamsburg 35.8, Finch 36.6, Osnabruck 53.5, Roxborough 35.3, Cornwall 47.1, Kenyon 34.8, Charlottenburg 42.7, Lochiel 35.3, and Lancaster 34.7.

Sir Samuel Hoare, a member of Neville Chamberlain's "inner cabinet" speaking at Swansea a week ago said: "The British Empire is invincible," "and any "blind and foolish people "who think otherwise will have the shock of their lives." The outlying sections of the British Empire can stand more of such talk, instead of the carping criticism of the defences, the air force and the navy, which too often comes to us.

THIS STRANGE WORLD.

"Socialism means that if you have two cows, you give one to your neighbour. Under Communism, you give both cows to the government, which gives you back some of the milk. Under Fascism you keep the cows but give the milk to the government, which sells you some of it back. And under New Dealism you shoot one cow, milk the other and then pour the milk down the sink!"

In Canada, thank goodness, we live in a free country, where a man may say what he thinks—if he isn't afraid of his wife, neighbours, or boss, and if he's sure it won't hurt his business or his reputation.

MILK THE CALF AND THE CHILD

Experiments Prove Pasteurized Milk Slightly Better Than Raw Product,—And Besides is Safer.

THE Milk Nutrition Committee of Great Britain have just issued their report of the experiments made to determine the relative values of raw and pasteurized milk in the nutrition of young animals.

In some quarters there are persistent efforts being made to convince the public that animals such as calves, pigs, rats, etc., do not thrive so well on pasteurized as they do on raw milk. All the experiments so far carried out in Great Britain, in the United States and in Canada are to the effect that animals without exception thrive if anything a trifle better on the pasteurized article.

At Reading, eleven pairs of calves from tubercle-free herds were fed for six months on milk from an accredited herd. For one-half these calves the milk given was raw; for the other half pasteurized milk from the same herd was used. The calves were weighed before and after the experiment and notes taken of their progress. The average weight for the pasteurized group was a little higher than that for those fed on raw milk. Towards the end of the experiments eight of the eleven raw-milk fed calves reacted to the tuberculin test. Only one of those fed on pasteurized milk gave a positive reaction.

Similar results were found from two separate experiments carried on at Aberdeen except that there was an insignificant advantage in favour of the raw-milk group.

Pneumonia was found to be commoner in the raw milk group. Those carrying on the experiments have concluded that raw milk and pasteurized milk have an almost identical nutritive value for calves but that there is a considerable risk of spreading tuberculosis among calves given raw milk.

The bearing of these results on the nutrition of children seems to be identical. Raw milk as a food is about as good but no better than pasteurized milk for children. The advantage of the pasteurized article is apparent from the fact that it rarely carries the seeds of tuberculosis, undulant fever, typhoid fever and the many other infections which experience has proved to be milk-borne.

Federal Proposal on Relief Cost Cause For Joy at Queen's Park

QUEEN'S PARK CLOSE-UPS

—By—
Paul Farrell

TORONTO. — Cabinet ministers at Queen's Park are wearing jubilant grins these days, following the announcement from Ottawa that the Federal Government will contribute up to 40 per cent to the cost of direct relief if the Provincial Government will do the same. This was the proposal put before Ottawa several years ago by Premier M. F. Hepburn and several times turned down by the Dominion.

For mayors throughout Ontario, the announcement changed the entire picture. A week ago, municipalities were on the verge of despair. The provincial government had warned it would pay no more than the federal administration, whose contribution at that time was only 20 per cent of the total cost of relief. The Ontario Mayors' Association then flatly declared that their towns and cities would contribute no more than 30 per cent. Now they find they have to contribute only 20 per cent, the senior governments paying the balance.

The problem of providing relief for transients, which has been a worry to municipalities since 1929, was met also. Federal and provincial governments will share the expense on a 50-50 basis, taking the entire burden from the backs of the harassed municipalities. This move was of particular benefit to the towns and villages which line the chief provincial highways and the main railway lines, which get more than their share of casual stragglers, migrating from north to south, east to west, in search of work, a meal or a bed.

To those municipalities which wish to undertake civic improvements as an alternative to direct relief, Ottawa will contribute 50 per cent direct labour costs. The catch to this proposal, so far as Ontario municipalities are concerned, is that the federal government insists that the projects obtain provincial approval and that the province contribute the other half of direct labour costs. The municipality provides the material. Hon. Eric Cross, minister of municipal affairs, has proved most reluctant to give provincial approval and cash to civic improvements of this nature and Ottawa recently accused him of "blocking" public works in 33 towns and cities.

By the way, the heavy spending programme now under way at Ottawa has convinced labinet ministers at Queen's Park that a federal election is planned for this coming autumn.

QUINTUPLETS WILL NOT SEE THEIR MAJESTIES ON TOUR.

THE Dionne quintuplets must go to Sudbury if they are to see the King and Queen. It is most unlikely that Dr. Allan Roy Dafoe will permit the trip. On his advice, the guardians have turned down million-dollar offers to have the quints shown at the New York world fair, the risk of infection in crowds being too great at their tender age. There would be the same risk at Sudbury.

North Bay and Callander are furious at being left off the royal route, as are Chatham and Windsor. Their respective mayors have all wired protests to Prime Minister Mackenzie King, but all they got were polite acknowledgements. If the trip of the King and Queen to Canada was to strengthen unity in this country, it has failed in its purpose in at least some municipalities—those overlooked in planning the royal tour.

HAS HEPBURN PULLED FAST ONE ON TORIES?

BEFORE he left for Australia, Premier Hepburn pulled what many regard as the most astute political manœuvre of his career. And Mr. Hepburn has pulled a great many. The Conservatives were all set to launch a withering attack on the premier on the basis that, as he had closed Chorley Park, there was no place in Toronto suitable to housing Their Majesties. There were to be many scornful things said about keeping the reigning monarchs of the British Empire "down in the smoke and grime of the freight yards at the foot of Spadina Avenue," for that is where Pullman cars are housed overnight at Toronto.

But Mitch beat his critics to the punch. He appointed Dr. H. A. Bruce, former lieutenant-governor; Col. Geo. A. Drew, Opposition Leader, and Hon. Harry Nixon, Acting Premier, to be a three-man committee to arrange details of Their Majesties' stay in Toronto. Hence, if there is criticism of the arrangements, Dr. Bruce and Col. Drew will be targets as well. They outnumber Mr. Nixon and hence control the committee.

SUCCESSFUL INDIAN RANCHERS.

Blackfoot Tribe in Alberta Have Become Thrifty Ranchmen in the Space of But Two Generations.

Facts About Canada

BLACKFOOT INDIANS living on the Peigan Reserve in the Pincher Creek region of Alberta have made good as ranchers and farmers, and are among the most prosperous and self-reliant of Canada's Indian population. The Department of Mines and Resources, which is charged with the administration of Indian Affairs, reports that this tribe has a herd of about 2,000 Shorthorn and Hereford cattle, as well as about 2,000 horses, and 5,000 of their 9,000-acre reserve under cultivation.

Ranching operations on the Peigan Reserve are carried out by the Indians themselves on a co-operative basis. The cattle herd belonge to sixty-five individual owners who stage a grand round-up each summer, during which each owner's brand is tallied, and as a precaution against mange, the animals are put through dipping pens under the supervision of a Governmen inspector. The cattle are remarkably free from disease and are among the best range herds of beef cattle in southern Alberta. On the market the Indian cattle bring premium prices, and from sales of about 400 head yearly the owners derive an annual revenue of from $15,000 to $20,000 at present prices. The reserve is in the shortgrass country and contains an ideal winter grazing range.

The successful transformation of these Indian people from hunters to farmers and ranchers has been accomplished within two generations. Before the coming of the white man, these Indians subsisted mainly on the great buffalo herds, but with the advance of settlement and the depletion of game resources that followed in its wake, they were left practically destitute. Fortunately their lands were suitable for agriculture and stock-raising, and it was only necessary for the Government of Canada to provide stock and equipment and establish them as farmers and ranchers under the supervision of instructors.

BEWARE OF WOLVES IN SHEEP'S CLOTHING.

A Letter in The Canadian Countryman.

THESE trespassers do not come in the form of thieves and armed thugs, but in the person of agents and salesmen who come uninvited onto our property and trespass on our time also and try to sell us anything from sewing needles to room lots of linoleums.

Today while I was busy preparing dinner a respectable-looking sedan car stopped at our gate and a man of perhaps forty-five walked briskly up to the front door and presented his card which explained that he was a deaf-mute and was endeavouring to make a living selling an assortment of needles priced at 25c. One could buy them on any notion counter for 15c.

I felt deep pity for a person so badly afflicted and, needing some small darning needles, I examined the packet. While I was testing the points, he turned and was looking across toward the field where my husband was ploughing. Without raising my head and, in fact, speaking in a lower voice than usual, I said, "These needles are 25c?" Quick as a flash he turned about and indicated with his finger the price on his introduction card. I was thoroughly convinced that his hearing was as good as mine. Here was a real hold-up man charging 25c for 15c worth of needles by playing on public sympathy. His number should have been taken and the police informed.

The "Smokeless Wick" dispenser was another of these high pressure salesmen. As his profit on each sale was small, he must hurry along and make as many calls as possible in a day. He was selling these smokeless wicks for 25 cents and guaranteed them for a year. These eight-inch lengths of wicks had a small strip of perforated metal clamped over one end. I was rather skeptical, but finally, when he offered me two for a quarter, I purchased them, inwardly rejoicing that I would only have to clean the chimneys once or twice during the year. For a few nights the flame glowed brightly, but as soon as the wick under the metal burned away the clamps fell off and before a week's time I was cleaning sooty chimnys again.

The "Linoleum Remnant" man had been laying coverings on floors of a large hotel in the next town and had these remnants over and rather than return them to the factory, was selling them at sacrifice prices. These pieces were no doubt goods obtained from warehouses and cut in convenieselves and distributed amongst the ent lengths by the salesmen themselves and distributed amongst the members of their gang.

I could cite many other "gags" which are used but have already given enough examples of how the dwellers in the country are swindled out of much valuable time and cash and the offenders allowed to escape persecution. And why? Simply because the amount involved is so small to each purchaser that he does not bother to follow up the case. But is it not time to enlist the help of the police of the local towns and put a ban on this petty roguery and make it safe for the authentic salesman?

CANADIAN SARDINES PROVE EXCELLENT LUNCHEON DISH

Tempting in Flavour, Delicious In Combination,—Sardines May Be Prepared in Many Ways.

Canadian Food News

TENDER little sardines — and you know Canadian sardines are packed the same day they are caught—which preserves all the fresh sea-caught flavour, make an excellent dish.

SARDINES EN COCOTTE.

1 can Canadian sardines
6 tablespoons top milk
6 eggs
seasonings

Butter six custard cups, and divide the sardines equally among them, mashing if desired, or cutting in pieces to fit. Break an egg in each custard cup, season as desired and spoon a tablespoon of top milk over each egg. Place in a baking pan filled with boiling water, cover and bake in a moderate oven (350 deg. F.) for 20 minutes, or until eggs are set. A large frying pan may be used if the custard cups will fit into it, or if fewer servings are needed. Partly fill the frying pan with boiling water, place the custard cups in gently, cover and cook on the top of the stove without letting the water completely boil, until the eggs are set (about 20 minutes).

* * * *

Make a mock rarebit by spreading sardines on toast, topping with a slab of cheese and placing under the broiler until the cheese melts.

* * * *

Try Canadian sardines grilled on toast, with the sauce that comes in the can heated and poured on top.

* * * *

Make sardines into a club sandwich with a slice of raw onion and some pickles on the side.

* * * *

Use sardines to stuff potatoes that have been baked, with a thick tomato sauce poured at the side of the plate.

Silver Wedding Anniversary Mr. and Mrs. Robt. Henderson

Sixty years of happy wedded life were quietly celebrated by Mr. and Mrs. Robert Henderson at their home in Winchester, Monday, where they received the congratulations of a wide circle of relatives and friends.

On January 30, 1879, Miss Margaret Davis, daughter of the late Ralph Davis and his wife, Margaret Connor, of North Augusta, was united in marriage to Robert Henderson, son of the late William Henderson and Mary Casselman of Winchester Springs. The ceremony was performed by the late Rev. Thomas Clarke at the rectory in Ogdensburg, N.Y.

Mr. Henderson compared the modes of travel then with those of today, when he hitched one of his father's best horses to a cutter, and after calling for his bride-to-be, who was then visiting relatives at Winchester Springs, drove to Prescott, a distance of 35 miles.

They crossed the river to Ogdensburg on a ferry, and, following the ceremony, returned to Prescott and later left in their horse-drawn vehicle for the bride's home at North Augusta and Escott.

On their return to Winchester Springs, Mr. and Mrs. Henderson took up residence on the Henderson homestead, where they lived for 10 years.

Mr. Henderson recalled one winter when he cut down several of the huge elm trees on his property, and during the spring floods floated the logs over the fields to a sawmill at Cass Bridge. Before the logs were cut, a hurricane destroyed the mill.

The dam broke, letting the water drop to such a low level the logs were left high and dry on the banks of the river. By the use of oxen they were hauled down to the stream, where they were floated to the nearest sawmill, which at that time was near Chesterville.

Helped Clear Village Site.

Mr. Henderson said that when he was a young boy he assisted his father, who was a native of Ireland, to clear much of the land which is occupied by the village today.

There were no cheese factories in that district 60 years ago, Mr. Henderson continued, and no money was derived from cattle except in the winter, and that was from the sale of butter if a farmer was fortunate enough to find a buyer.

Farmers were often compelled to pack their butter in tubs and keep it for several months before they were able to market it. The butter was kept in a wholesome condition during the hot weather by salting it heavily and storing it in the cellar of their homes. Thirteen cents a pound was the top price for butter at that time, Mr. Henderson remarked.

Always fond of hunting, Mr. Henderson said that partridge and deer were plentiful then, and hardly a day went by but they had a feast of wild fowl or venison, thus saving their beef and pork for market.

When asked why farmers today were finding it difficult to make a living when he and other men of his day made a success out of the same occupation under severe handicaps, Mr. Henderson said: "Machinery is too expensive. We could buy a mower for $30 fifty years ago, and while we found it difficult to market our produce, we didn't have to worry about paying out all we earned in taxes. The farmer has it a whole lot easier at the present time—machinery does the work the settler had to do by hand.

"This convenience is costing him plenty. As for me, I prefer the earlier days."

Mrs. Henderson, who is the mother of seven children, prefers living conditions today to those of her early womanhood. Although she thinks the present generation of girls are living too fast and don't take enough interest in home life, she would not like to see them go through the hardships she encountered as a girl. Looking back to the early days of her marriage, Mrs. Henderson says she has done everything on a farm, except to plough. She was an expert spinner and weaver and made most of the clothing for the family.

In addition to farming at Winchester Springs, Mr. and Mrs. Henderson have farmed at Maple Ridge and Chesterville, where they are well known. They also operated a sanatorium at Winchester Springs several years ago, and for the past quarter of a century have been residents of Winchester.

Members of their family are Mrs. George Kirkwood and Mrs. Harvey Smith, of Winchester Springs; Mrs. M. Davis, of Montreal; Mrs. Kenneth Hutt, of Maple Ridge; John and William Henderson, of Winchester. A third son, Wesley, died several years ago.

One of the features of the diamond wedding anniversary, was a dinner tendered to Mr. and Mrs. Henderson at the home of their granddaughter, Mrs. Donald Redmond, and attended by most of their children.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Henderson are enjoying good health. The former is 84 and the latter 85 years of age.

Right Either Way.

"I hear there are twins at the Bates house—boys or girls?"

"I think one's a boy and the other a girl — but it may be the other way around."

KIND THOUGHTS.

Fay Inchfawn.

It does not take much cleverness
To think out spiteful things;
It doesn't take much strategy
To speak the thought that stings;
Any one can frown and growl
When life's a weary mile,
So why not be a royal soul
And think kind thoughts and smile.

DEVELOPMENT OF OVERTURES TO BE DISCUSSED BY DAMROSCH

Dr. Walter Damrosch will discuss the development of operatic and concert overture forms during the sixth concerts in Series C and D of the NBC Music Appreciation Hour, Friday, 2.00 to 3.00 p.m. A review of the lives and works of the early 19th century composers Franz Schubert, Robert Schumann and Felix Mendelsshon will also be considered.

HELEN HAYES TO BE HEARD IN LEWIS' "ARROWSMITH"

Helen Hayes, star of the screen and stage, has chosen "Arrowsmith" as the dramatic vehicle for her appearance on the Orson Welles "Playhouse" broadcast to be heard over CBC's commercial network on Friday, 9.00 until 10 p.m.

This story by Sinclair Lewis, of a doctor-scientist and his fight against the dread bubonic plague, was made into a motion picture some time ago, starring Miss Hayes and Ronald Colman.

STAR OF SATURDAY'S OPERA STARTED AS A CHOIR BOY

Benjamino Gigli, Italian tenor, making his first appearance in seven years on the NBC broadcasts by the Metropolitan Opera Company, will sing the rôle of Radames in the performance of Verdi's "Aida" to be heard in Canada, Saturday, 1.55 to 5.15 p.m., over the CBC national network.

Gigli was born at Recanati, Italy, in 1890. His father was sexton of the largest church there, and for many years the boy sang in the choir, early to become the leading soloist. Even then, his voice attracted great attention. At the Rome Conservatory of Music he studied under Rosati, and his operatic début took place at Rovigo in 1914, in the opera "La Gioconda." His successful début led to a brilliant career as one of Italy's most celebrated singers.

ENGLISH CHORISTERS TO SING OVER CBC FROM OTTAWA

The Ladybrook Ladies' Choir, now on its first North American tour, will be presented by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on Saturday, 6.30 to 7.00 p.m., in a special concert to be heard over the coast-to-coast network from CBC's Ottawa studios.

The 26-voice ensemble, under the direction of Elsie Harrop, A.R.C.M., comes from the village of Hazel Grove in Lancashire, England. Organized in 1927 by Miss Harrop, the choir was originally formed from a small class of girls attending the local Council School. From that date it has had outstanding success at the leading festivals in the North of England, and has also appeared at the BBC, and the Manchester Tuesday Mid-day Society's concerts, for which it has been re-engaged this year.

"THE BISHOP OF DREAMS" JOLLY PLAY WEDNESDAY

A bishop who warns his parishioners against raising money for their pet charities through "raffles, sweeps and lucky dips" but who gets into the British press when he dreams about the Derby, is the central character in the comedy "The Bishop Dreams." John Cairns will direct this as his second dramatic feature, while attached to the production department of the CBC. Mr. Cairns, who is on loan from the Australian Broadcasting Commission, has selected this radio comedy by A. L. Phillips for the dramatic bill to be heard over the CBC's national network, Wednesday, 10.30 to 11 p.m.

Bishop Downchester, speaking at the annual meeting of the Society for the Rescue of Infirm Cab Horses confesses that he has dreamed about "Silk Shirt" and "Top Hat," two entries in the Epsom Downs Race. His brother, Henry, who is devoted to the things that the bishop eschews, including horse racing, confesses that he, too, has dreamed of the race and, on purely psychological grounds, the bishop consents to a dream experiment that ends on a note not generally sounded in his well-ordered household.

Winchester Youth Arrested Following Ottawa Car Crash

Two women suffered minor injuries and damage of $425 was caused when two automobiles collided at the intersection of Metcalfe and Cooper streets, Ottawa, at 2.45 p.m., Sunday.

Lloyd Dixon, 22, of Winchester, the driver of one of the cars, was arrested on a charge of reckless driving, later being released on bail of $50.

Constable Walter Hudson reported Dixon was driving east on Cooper and his car crashed into the side of a south bound car in charge of Arthur Gaulin, 221 St. Patrick street, Ottawa. The Gaulin car skidded side-ways and damaged an iron fence on the south-east corner.

Miss K. Lynn, 262 Lisgar street, a passenger in the Gaulin car, suffered bruises to her right arm while Miss Eleanor Melvin, of Winchester, a passenger in Dixon's car, suffered a slight injury to her left knee. Miss Ruth Dixon and Dwight Jones, both of Winchester, the other passengers, were not injured.

The constable reported the Dixon car skidded 32 feet before the crash. He said Dixon told him he failed to stop for the stop sign and when he saw the other car his brakes failed to hold on the slippery road.

There was $200 damage to the Gaulin car and $225 damage to the Dixon car.

Canada's Defence Expenditure Will be Major Issue of Parliament

MIRROR OF THE NATION —By— "Commoner"

WITH the increase by the Government of the appropriation for national defence to over $63,000,000, it becomes certain that defence will be a major issue of the parliamentary session. The issue will not be the amount of the proposed expenditure but the manner in which it is to be spent. It is evident that all the Opposition parties and groups inthe House of Commons are preparing to impose a close check-up on armament orders and contracts given under the doubled defence expenditures of the last three years and on definite assurances regarding the way in which the huge sum the Government is now asking Parliament to vote is to be spent.

The proposed defence appropriation for the next fiscal year is more than double that for the present fiscal year and nearly four times the authorized expenditure three years ago. Little disposition is evident in any quarter to question the wisdom, or even the necessity of these increases. The European crisis of last September together with the elaborate defence plans of the United States Government have made all parties in Parliament deeply defence-conscious. This concern for defence has been strengthened by current developments in Europe. It is recognized by all parties that Canada must be armed as quickly as possible to meet the threat of danger. Two years ago the modest increase in the defence appropriations was submitted with excuses and apologies. Now the Government raises the appropriation to an unprecedented peace-time figure in full confidence explanation is unnecessary. It has already indicated that it expects credit from the country for the more generous provision for the defence of Canada. The amount of the present proposed expenditure was decided upon only after the Administration had convinced itself that it would be accepted in Parliament and the country without criticism. There will be little, if any, criticism on the score of the amount.

SENATE ALSO SERIOUSLY INTERESTED IN GUN DEAL

BUT Parliament, willing to double without question the expend.ture on defence, is displaying a decided opposition to see, as far as it can, that Canada gets defence for the money. In this, it is now clear, the Conservative Opposition is going to have the earnest support of other groups facing the Government in the House of Commons. It is practically certain, too, that the Senate will go seriously into the question of how the miliions voted for defence in the last three years have been spent and what safeguards are to be set up to protect the vastly greater expenditure now proposed. In short, the Administration is likely to be on the defensive throughout the session in the matter of its conduct of the vital business of arming Canada for defence.

HUGE SUM FOR ARMS LINKED WITH DISCLOSURES

THE $63,000,000 defence appropriation asked for by the Government the other day was at once connected, in discussion in all quarters of Parliament, with the disclosures recently made regarding the course of the Ministry in relation to the Bren machine gun contract. The intention of the Opposition parties to explore the Bren gun transaction and to insist on an explanation of the Defence Ministry's handling of that vital item in defence armament involving a cost of several millions of dollars takes on much more than a partisan complexion in view of their responsibility for doing all that Opposition parties can do to protect the public interest in connection with the large expenditure now proposed. The doubling of the financial provision for defence has had the effect of doubling parliamentary interest in the Bren gun deal and in the larger question of what the country has got for the nearly $90,000,000 voted by Parliament for defence in the last three years.

GRANT MacNEIL, C.C.F. MEMBER, SAYS FINDINGS AN INDICTMENT

THE first assault on the Government's handling of the Bren machine gun matter came at the end of the week from a veteran of the Great War, Grant MacNeil, C.C.F. member for Vancouver North. He devoted his entire allotted time in the debate on the Address to the record of that transaction as revealed in the report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry tabled in Parliament at the opening of the session. He showed that the Commissioner's report, so far from being a vindication of the machine gun transaction and an exoneration of those responsible for it, was actually an impressive indictment of the Government, and particularly of the Minister of Defence, on the way in which they had handled that particular item in the business of arming Canada to meet the threat of war.

"Much was forgiven because of the emergencies of wartime," the veteran of the Great War said in reverting to the evils of patronage in connection with army contracts in 1914-18. "There can be no such excuse for similar practices now....The responsibility lies upon the Government to deal severely with those who have been playing ducks and drakes with defence appropriations. Defence purchasing must be freed entirely from political patronage."

The Vancouver Member regarded the Bren gun affair as one of the most serious questions before Parliament because of the huge spending by the Department of Defence and the vital necessity of ensuring that the spending was to good purpose. "We have good cause to ask if the millions requested from Parliament are actually for the defence of Canada or for the defence of the profits of the privileged ring of armament contractors.....It now rests with Parliament to determine whether there has been a gross betrayal of public trust." As to the relationship of Hon. Ian McKenzie, Minister of Defence, to the machine gun transaction, Mr. MacNeil said, "I venture to predict that it will be one of the most humiliating episodes of his public career." Basing his presentation of the case on the report of the Commissioner, he pointed out that it had been "shown by the evidence that the intentions of the Government, as declared in the House, and accepted in good faith, were evaded and even thwarted by those responsible for the negotiations leading up to the execution of the contract."

DECLARED POLICY GIVEN UP FOR GOVERNMENT CONTROL

THE declared policy of the Government in connection with armaments is that of the public ownership and operation of armament plants. At the Bren gun inquiry, the Minister of Defense professed adherence to that policy. In justification of his abandonment of it in the case of the Bren gun he contended that the thirty millions or so voted by Parliament for defence last year was not enough to permit of the establishment of a Government factory for the production of machine guns. The Vancouver member, in refutation of this, pointed to the Commissioner's report which revealed that according to undisputed factual evidence the cost of such a plant would have been at most $120,000 and that the Government already possessed most of the equipment required for the manufacture of the guns, which equipment subsequently was handed over to the preferred contractor. He pointed also to the fact that the report contained evidence showing that the Department of Defence had decided on its machine gun requirements as early as 1936 and that for months thereafter the Chief of the General Staff was repeatedly urging that production be proceeded with in a Government plant.

Next to Government operation of armament plants, the Minister of Defence professed to favour private manufacture on a competitive basis. Mr. MacNeil showed from the Commissioner's report that for two years those responsible for defence had exerted every effort not only to have the Canadian contract for machine guns go to a favoured contractor but to have him secure a similar contract from the British Government notwithstanding that the latter had desired that the guns should be manufactured in a Canadian Government plant. Repeated proposals by departmental officials that experience manufactures be given opportunity of submitting bids were rejected. "According to the evidence a determined effort was made to eliminate all other manufacturers from the opportunity specially created for the manufacture of this gun by a favoured contractor.....He was given a privileged status in England, a status that could not be obtained by any other manufacturer. No stone was left unturned to place him in a preferred position above all others. No attempt was made to discover whether these guns could be made in any other plant in Canada." Mr. MacNeil pointed out that the efforts to favour this contractor were carried on despite the fact that the officials of the Defence Department were unable after investigation to report that his plant was suitable for the manufacture of such guns.

TO ASK DEFENCE MINISTER WHERE MONEY WAS SPENT

IT is now apparent that the Administration will be disappointed in its hope of sidetracking interest in the Bren gun transaction by its proposal to set up a munitions purchasing board. The interest of the Opposition parties in securing further light on the handling of the machine gun order has been stimulated by the projected increased expenditure on defence.

There will be a demand for information also as to what the Minister of Defence has to show for the doubled outlay on defence during the last two years. The Vancouver Member gave indication of the question that is in the minds of many others when he said: "No one can understand where the money has gone." As soon as opportunity is afforded, the Government will be required to show where it has gone.

CONSERVATIVE POLICY CITED ON ARMS MANUFACTURE

THE policy of the Conservative party on defence armaments has already been enunciated by Hon. Dr. Manion. It is that all arms and munitions needed for the direct defence of Canada should either be manufactured by the Government itself or under the complete control of the Government, with profits eliminated. It calls also for the complete control of profits in the manufacture of arms and munitions of all kin.'s for the the United Kingdom. Dr. Manion has stated that he regards these proposals as fair because they leave plenty of opportunity for private enterprise, give a real opportunity for service to Canada and assure co-operation and a fair deal to the Empire, and Canadian producers a share of the immense British contracts for armaments which are required.

HON. H. H. STEVENS SPEAKS ON WASHINGTON TREATY

A NOTABLE feature of the proceedings in the Commons before the end of the week was the first performance of Hon. H. H. Stevens since his return to his old place in the Conservative Party. He told the House frankly of his pride and pleasure at being associated with the new Leader of the Opposition whose approach to the various social and economic problems of Canada had always given due weight to the human equation. It was to these economic problems that Mr. Stevens devoted his attention. His criticism of the Government was chiefly on the score of its failure to give any encouragement to the harassed business man, the young people of the country, the unemployed workers, or the stricken farmer. He regretted that nothing more substantial was offered than further commissions and more constitutional questions and he attributed this to an absence of leadership.

Mr. Steven's speech attracted attention particularly by his examination of the Washington trade bargain. He was specially concerned with the Prime Minister's contention that it should be regarded as a contribution by Canada to international good relations, maintaining that there was no justification for Caada's paying the price it was called upon to pay for this contribution under the terms of the treaty. As a former Minister of Trade and Commerce he saw in the most-favoured nation aspects of the trade bargain one of the most serious disadvantages to Canada. Under the most-favoured-nation treaties concessions granted to the United States in the recent bargain went automatically to thirty-two other nations, including those now threatening the peace of the world, and for them this country received absolutely nothing in return. He believed that internal distress already prevailing in Canada was likely to be distinctly aggravated by the operation of the Washington bargain, and internal distress in the case of other nations had resulted in the international disturbances which the Prime Minister was seeking to allay. While not advocating that Canada should hold aloof from international affairs, the former Minister regretted that the Prime Minister subordinated internal affairs to them to the extent he did.

THE Washington trade bargain will be the subject of one of the most serious debates of the session. In preparation for it the Opposition has been assembling material since the session opened.

One Man's Loss; Another Man's Gain

SPEED KANE looked across at his immediate superior, Herb Rowe, with fine disdain. "Your ancestors," he snorted, must have been plumbers!"

"Yeh?" inquired Herb.

"Yes, because you are so good at dirty digs."

Herb had just made a remark to the effect that Lew Whitehall, one of the copy men, didn't know the war was over. He had also implied that Lew might possibly be rated as dumb.

"He's a good scout, and you know it," declared Speed. "You've got no cause to be handing a black eye."

'Humph!" said Herb, and shrugged his shoulders. "I didn't know Whitehall was a pal of yours. If you think well of him, then it's O.K. with me. I'm not one to go cutting corners on somebody's friendship. And it's fine the way you stick for him. Some day, maybe you'll have a big advertising firm of your own, and you can give him a job. He'll probably be needing one. But let me say this much, young fellow: if that bird's a good copy writer, then I've been cheated out of a million dollars."

Speed didn't answer. What was the use? Herb never could understand Lew Whitehall. Nobody around the place appreciated Lew. Even the big chief didn't seem to know that Lew was in the office. If they could only know him as Speed knew him!

It was a peculiar friendship that existed between Speed and Lew. Perhaps they found each other interesting because they were so different.

Speed, assistant to Herb Rowe, production manager of the Hannibal Advertising Agency, was full of pep and hustle. He got a real thrill out of jumping head first into a pile of work and shaking a snappy result from it. He wasn't afraid of any job—a go-getter, a clean, hard hitter.

On the other hand, Lew Whitehall was a dreamer. He was the most brilliant member of the copy staff. He was also the most useless. He could write beautiful advertisements when they didn't mean anything. The King's English was pure gold to him to be spun into silky threads and woven into classics. Once he had written to an inkwell, and it had been read over the radio by a university professor and had been complimented as a fine bit of poetry. But when it came to writing an advertisement that would move a few shovels, radio tubes or automobile tires or what-nots from a dealer's shelf he seemed to get self-conscious and lose his wallop.

Which was too bad, for Lew was a likable fellow, unassuming, kindly interested in others. And it was pathetic that he should be spending his time on a few trifling accounts that hardly justified the effort of the beekkeeper in making out the invoices.

Now and then, when work was a bit slack in the production department, Speed would go into Lew's office and listen to amazing discourses on philosophy, art and literature. These were all new subjects to Speed, who had worked his way up from a tenement. Some day he'd know about them. Meanwhile, there was Lew, eager to enlighten him. Speed would wonder how any man could know so much, as he sat there and listened to Lew.

"I'd like to see the day when every advertisement is a work of real genius," Whitehall would say. "The copy should be literature; the art should be worthy of exhibition in the greatest galleries. Then advertising would be worth while."

This sounded quite all right to Speed. There would be a real kick in ordering cuts from a canvas by such a master as Winslow Homer or John Sargent, and in having type set from a manuscript wrought by a Conrad or a Kipling, though Speed had never heard of these fellows.

"I'll bet Abraham Lincoln could have written some dandy ads," he said one day, remembering the Gettysburg Address he had studied at night school.

It had been after such a talk with Lew that Speed had come back to the production department full of enthusiasm for the copy man's knowledge and wisdom and had foolishly boasted of them, when Herb got off his cutting remark about Lew not knowing the war was over.

Of course, Speed didn't accept Herb's judgment at its face value. Yet it made him think. And it worried him for he had heard rumours to the effect that Lew wasn't so wonderful in comparison with the other copy men. And once before Herb had said that Lew Whitehall wouldn't have any more chance than a string of sausages in a dog pound if the big chief ever realized how little he was doing.

Something was wrong; no doubt of it. Surely, Lew ought to be able to write copy that would make them all sit up and take notice. Speed's heart ached to help his friend in some way.

"He's too big for those silly little accounts," mused Speed. "If he ever got a chance to work on some real business, he'd set this place on fire. What he needs is to sell himself to the chief."

Just like that. The solution of the whole problem was so obvious to Speed that he went back to Lew's office to give his friend the needed advice.

But when he stood at Lew's desk, he felt awkward and out of place. What right had he to be giving advice to a man like Lew? He felt like a cat looking at a king, in spite of what Herb had said.

Lew was quick to note Speed's uneasiness. "Something worrying you, boy?"

"No-er—that it—"

"Well, you don't need to tell me," continued Lew, easily, "but I know something is wrong. I don't blame you for being unhappy here. You ought to have a much better job than you have there in the productiong department. And now—"

Speed couldn't help staring wide-eyed at the fellow. If this wasn't just like old Lew! Always thinking about how to help somebody else.

"And now," Lew's voice was like that of a father, "I've got a suggestion to make to you, Speed. It's a real hunch. You ought to be writing copy."

"Me?"

"Yes, you. With your enthusiasm and pep, if you could put your feelings on paper you'd be a winner!"

"Why, gosh! I never could write ads half as good as you can, Lew."

But Lew didn't pay any attention to Speed's objections. "Tell you what, Speed. Go ahead and write some ads—say, on the Hanover account. Two or three pieces. No need of telling anybody else. Bring them to me, and I'll make suggestions. All you need is practice. Do as I say, and I'll help you to make the chief pay you a real salary."

Now, what could Speed do? Fine chance he had of giving advice to Lew when that individual was engrossed with the idea of making Speed into a world-beater of a copy man! And, in spite of his misgivings, Speed realized it wasn't such a bad idea. So he promised to try—and before he realized it he was back at his own desk without a word about Lew selling himself to the boss.

"Helping me write Hanover ads, when he hasn't even a chance to write them himself," thought Speed. "Helping me get a better job, when he's about to lose his own. Either I'm nutty or else he is. But I reckon I'd be a sap if I refused to let him help me with a lift."

SPEED, as may be surmised, was not exactly a stupid boy. He knew a good deal of the world and its bumps. He knew that a man must make an effort to attain any worthwhile goal. Several years ago he had seen another boy fired and had run into the office to get a job. Yes, often a man can benefit by the misfortunes of others. And maybe, after all, Lew wasn't going to lose out. Yes, it was a good thing, probably, that he hadn't been able to advise Lew. Lew was years older and would be able to take care of himself.

But it was with a very decided twinge of his conscience that Speed set himself that evening to the new task of writing advertisements for Hanover. Now and then he'd try to console himself. "I'd be as dumb as he is, if I let a chance like this slip through my fingers," he would muse.

All evening, he sat with pencil and paper, studying a proof of an advertisement written by Steve Roberts, the best copy man on the whole Hannibal staff. He'd put down a sentence, then tear up the paper. Words that seemed so smooth and expressive as handled by Steve were cold and meaningless when Speed used them. Far after his regular bedtime he laid aside paper and pencil in disgust.

Several evenings of strenuous effort were required to complete three puny little pieces of copy that Speed considered worthy of being shown to Lew. And when he finally placed them on Whitehall's desk he felt almost silly. "I reckon if I'm a copy writer," he said, "then the advertising business is going to be terribly overcrowded. There are a million guys who can write better things than this."

But Lew didn't answer. He took up the sheets and read each one carefully. Lew wasn't a man to hurt another's feelings. Presently, he laid them down again and looked at Speed. "They're not so bad—that is, for a beginning. Try it again. Just imagine you're putting down phrases nobody but yourself will ever see. You lost your nerve when you found yourself face to face with a white sheet of paper. Make them the kind of stuff you like to read yourself!"

It was on the tip of Speed's tongue to reply that Lew himself needed just the advice he had been giving. Why couldn't Lew understand the situation and make an effort of his own to overcome this difficulty? Speed found himself worried more than ever and rapidly losing his patience with Lew. It really did begin to appear that Lew was dumb, just as Herb had said. But—oh, well.

Some more copy was written, and again Lew went over it carefully. "This is better," he said gently. "But it's not what you ought to be doing. If you'd just let go—"

"It's no use," begged Speed. "I'll never be able to turn out that stuff as it should be done. If the Creator had intended me to be a writer he'd have given me more head and not so much legs, wouldn't he?"

Lew laughed, ,but refused to give up the idea. "I tell you what I'll do. I'll write an advertisement on Hanover and you study it. Maybe you can follow. something I write easier than Roberts' work. Now you run along, and I'll give you something this afternoon."

And, as might be expected, Lew Whitehall proceeded to write a masterpiece on Hanover, when it didn't have anything to do with the bank balance of the firm. It was brilliant, clear, concise, compelling, a beautiful bit of craftmanship.

Speed read it over several times, and it made him feel discouraged, and sick at heart. It discouraged him, because he knew he never could write such a perfect advertisement. And it made him sick at heart, because he realized that Lew Whitehall had let himself go and had turned out the sort of thing he was capable of doing. "He has done exactly what he advised me to do," thought Speed. "I haven't any more chance of doing work like that than I have of taking Hoover's place in the White House next Monday morning. Yes, I reckon Herb was right. Lew is a boob to sit back and let the world throw him for a loss when he can write like this."

Whereupon, Speed stuck Lew's copy back in a drawer of his desk and decided that, for the present anyhow, he would forget the whole idea. He believed in making a try for something better, but he didn't want to be foolish. He had a good job now. Better stick to that. And something deep down inside of him told him that Lew wasn't a sound adviser to have. But, even so, Speed couldn't forget that wonderful advertisement Lew had writtent. "I bet I could sell the chief on making me the first copy writer," mused Speed, "if I could take a piece of copy like that to him. I wish I had a chance to sell myself on work like that. And Lew—"

Next morning, Speed was busy with his orders and checking, when Herb looked over his way, having finished reading the morning newspaper.

"That guy Whitehall," said Herb, "is going to be leaving one of these days. I thought maybe you hadn't heard."

"You mean he's going to be canned?" asked Speed, anxiously.

"No, I mean that he already has been canned. It seems that the chief walked in on him yesterday and interrupted a beautiful dream long enough to tell your friend that it might be well for him to make arrangements to sleep elsewhere for after the first of the month the Hannibal organization was going to try to struggle along without him."

"A darned shame!" declared Speed.

"Yeh, of course it is. But the chief must have felt like a Salvation Army worker to allow Witehall to loaf about here so long."

It was time for drastic action now, and Speed didn't hesitate. He went on the run to Lew's office. "I heard you were through," Speed said. "Now here is what you ought to do. Go right in and—"

Lew shook his head. "No, I guess I don't fit in here. I'll find a place somewhere else, all right."

"Don't fit in? Why, gosh, Lew, don't let the big chief throw you out that easily. Go in and make him understand how good you are and—"

"He knows that already." And Lew smiled ruefully.

"But he doesn't know you can write advertisements like that one for Hanover you did for me." And Speed banged an earnest fist on the copy man's desk. "Go in and make him give you a chance!"

But Lew shook his head again. "No, I don't believe that would do any good. It probably would be better for me to try somewhere else."

Speed turned away in disgust. He had no patience at all with a quitter. Lew was yellow. He not only had not done the work he should have done, but he was afraid to stand up and make a fight. Bah! Such people are only fit for doormats for other people. Why, Lew would be always going from one agency to another, never doing anything worth while.

"Darn it! A mouse will try to fight a dog when it gets cornered!" growled Speed to himself through clenched teeth.

But all the time, there was running through Speed's mind the realization that Lew had been a good friend. Lew had tried to help. The thought annoyed Speed, but what could he do about it? Hadn't he tried to help Lew?

Whereupon, he tried to bury himself in his work. You could safely bet your bottom dollar that his job wasn't going to be taken away from him without a real scrap.

But Lew—Lew was a friend; Lew was a boob; Lew had tried to help him; he had tried to help Lew; Lew was a good scout!

SATURDAY afternoon, Speed was at his desk long after most of the others had gone home. Speed didn't like to let the week-end come upon him with work left undone. He was digging into his work with a real vigour when the telephone rang: "Come into Mr. Hannibal's office, please."

When Speed entered the big room he found the chief had a caller, none other than Mr. Hanover himself client extraordinary. Something serious must be in the air. The chief was frowning terribly. He came to the point at once, wasting no time on greetings.

"We need a piece of Hanover copy for a trade journal. See if there is any on file."

Speed went out, looked, and was back in a few minutes. No, there was no copy in the file.

Hmph!" snorted the chief. "Can't understand this. And Roberts and Stripp are both gone. That publication closes in New York on Monday morning. Don't see why Stripp didn't see to it that we had some extra copy on hand. Can't reach either of them on the telephone. Nobody around to write anything. Mr. Hanover wanting service—"

Mr. Hannibal talked on and on, airing his grievances in fine style. But Speed wasn't listening. An idea was forming in his mind. It was dawning upon him that, if he could present a suitable piece of copy at this very psychological moment, it wouldn't be a bad stroke of business for himself. The chief wouldn't soon forget such co-operation. It was a glorious opportunity for Speed to make his début as a copy writer, if he was ever to do such a thing. A great idea, but it didn't scare Speed, at all. It spelled opportunity to him. It was another step upward on the old ladder. He faced Mr. Hannibal boldly. "I'll get you a piece of copy for this advertisement."

"You? Why—why—well, I suppose you might as well try. There doesn't seem to be anything else. Hurry!"

Speed went on a run to his own desk. He'd show the chief that he wouldn't wilt under fire. He'd write that ad or he'd know the reason.

Paper and pencil; all ready — let's go! The pencil didn't move. Speed's brain seemed to be made of cork. Not a word came forth for the purpose of building a logical sales argument for Hanover. Finally, in sheer desperation, he put down a sentence—then realized that he had remembered it from one of Roberts' advertisements. Not so good. He couldn't hope to get by the chief with old stuff like that. But what to do? He sat there chewing his pencil helplessly.

Then he thought of Lew. "Gee! If I could only write like that fellow. He didn't have the spunk to make an opportunity like this for himself. I wonder why? But he—"

Speed remembered that Lew's advertisement for Hanover was right there in his desk. If that advertisement could be taken in to the chief! It would ring the bell, all right. But no, it was Lew's work. He had no right to it. If Lew were only there. And yet—Lew was a dumbbell. Out tramping the streets, looking for another job, no doubt. Lew wasn't worth a chance like this. Lew wouldn't know how to make the most of such an opportunity, even if he were here. But that advertisement was worth a lot to somebody right now. The boss was waiting for it. Yet. Lew was a friend. Lew was also a failure!

Speed's mind was working fast. He grabbed open the drawer of his desk, and brought forth Lew's advertisement. It was soiled a bit now. So he rushed into Lew's office, sat down at the typewriter, banged off a fresh, clean copy. Then he read it over hurriedly for possible mistakes in copying. It read like a million dollars. It was just the thing that would please the chief most. Further, it was the only solution to the problem of how to make that Monday morning closing date in New York City.

Poor old Lew! If he had only had a little spunk! Maybe the chief would not definitely ask who wrote the copy. At any rate—in another minute the copy was on the president's desk. Mr. Hannibal picked it up dubiously, started to read, then his face brightened. But he said nothing, merely handing it over to Hanover.

"This is the best work your agency has ever done for me!" said the client, enthusiastically. "Send it along." And the man was gone.

Which left Speed alone with the chief. And the chief turned to Speed with smiling face, heaping upon him the glory that belonged to Lew Whitehall. And it was glory that Lew needed worse than an automobile tire needs air. But if Lew had had any pep in him this situation would never have been possible. The chief seemed about to speak — and Speed dreaded what he might have to say. There were so many chances for complications, and Speed's drastic plan of action didn't have any place for complications. He leaned far over Mr. Hannibal's desk.

"If a man can produce copy like that regularly he ought to have a job as a copy-writer here, oughtn't he?"

The chief beamed happily. "Yes, yes, of course. This is just the kind of work we're always trying to get. I'm surprised that you can do it. Write some more and we'll talk it over."

So, Speed managed to get away without having to dodge a definite question about authorship. And he would have had to lie about it. Which wouldn't have been so good, with such a fine job hanging in the air.

Monday morning Speed betook himself to Lew Whitehall's office again. He pretended it was just an ordinary social call, and made a few remarks about the weather and other such innocuous topics. Then, finally, "You remember that advertisement you wrote for me, Lew?"

"Surely. I hope it helped you."

"Yes, it has helped a lot. I can't tell you how much. But I'm going to ask another favour of you, Lew. I know this will sound like I've got a terrible crust, but I'll make it up to you some way. Write me twelve more ads just as good as that first one, will you?"

"Twelve?" And Lew looked up in surprise.

"Yes: you'll be going away, maybe, and I won't see you again if you do, and I'd like to have these advertisements for samples."

"Well, I'll be glad to," said Lew. "It will help me pass the time."

And Lew Whitehall, sitting there in his lonely office, with his job gone, and with nothing at stake except to help a friend, wrote twelve of the finest advertisements that ever came from a typewriter. He put his very soul into them. He made them romp and shout and laugh through the most amazing reasons-why that could be imagined.

Speed read them through, and his conscience hurt him more than ever as he carried them to the chief.

"They're even better than that first one," said the chief with decision. "I can't understand it, but you simply must work on copy. We need you."

"But," and Speed seemed to be hesitating, trying to find suitable words to express himself, "you'll agree that anybody who can write such ads as these is good regardless of what he may have been doing, won't you?"

Mr. Hannibal smiled magnanimously. "It doesn't make a bit of difference to me whether he was an office boy, an assistant in the production department, or a janitor. I don't care who or what the man is, I've got a job for him. Now, just as soon as I can get another boy to take your place out there in—"

Speed was trembling all over. The crisis had come, the crisis he had dreaded and feared. But the only way for him now was to go through with his plan, desperate as it seemed to be at this moment. As he looked into the shrewd eyes of his chief his courage returned.

"These advertisements were all written by Mr. Whitehall," said Speed. He saw Mr. Hannibal's face fall, and he hurried on. "You see, he is peculiar. He thought he was writing them to help me learn to be a copy-writer. If he had thought they were for a client he wouldn't have done so well. I asked him to write them for me, so you would see how good he really is."

"How good he is! My goodness, my young man. Don't you know I've alread discharged him?"

"Of course, I do. But you just said that anybody who could write such advertisements could always have a job with you. Don't you see, Mr. Hannibal? I've done this for him in such a way that he'll realize now how to do his best work. He'll make good for you, all right. I promise that. Please give him another chance."

MR. HANNIBAL didn't answer for a long time; just sat there and looked out of the window. He seemed to have forgotten about Lew Whitehall, all about advertisements. Presently he turned to Speed. "I say, why did you do this for Whitehall?"

"Why did I do it? Huh. I never really thought about it. He is a good friend. I reckon I didn't do any more than he'd have done for me."

Mr. Hannibal smiled a little. "So you call it friendship, eh. Well, I call it a perfect piece of salesmanship. You have taken a product that was in bad repute; you have brought out its good qualities; you have made a disinterested prospect eager to buy your product; and you put over the sale—all of which you call friendship. Let me tell you—"

Speed leaned far over the big desk. "You mean that Lew is going to have another chance?"

"Oh, yes, surely. Any man who can write as well as this must have another chance. But I'm not concerned about him. There are always plenty of copy-writers. But real salesmen are scarce. You hurry up and grow the appearance of a few more years on your face, and I'll start you out after new accounts. And, just to show my good faith, I'm going to tack another five dollars on your pay cheque. How's that, young man?"

"Gee!" Speed swallowed four times his eyes like saucers, his fingers fairly itching to get hold of a brief case. "Me, a salesman! I sure will be ready when you say the word."

World-Wide Telephone System Illustrated by Sound Movies

The routine work of constructing and maintaining a world-wide telephone service was shown by means of sound pictures to members of the Chesterville Rotary Club by J.C.N. Cochrane, manager of the Cornwall division of the Bell Telephone Co., and Fred Motton, of the company's publicity department, Montreal, at the club's weekly luncheon, Tuesday evening. The pictures were shown in the Community Hall and a number of other citizens were present with the Rotarians.

Geo. J. Hunt, local manager of the Bell, introduced the district manager and Mr. Motton, the latter being an expert photographer and the writer of the scenario for "Grey Owl's Little Brother," one of the reels shown. Mr. Cochrane, who succeeded J. J. Gardiner as manager of the Cornwall district, has been with the company 14 years, having served in Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa and Pembroke.

The pictures included two series of "Communication News and Views," "An Empire Link," "Voices of the Air," "The Other Christmas Tree," and "Grey Owl's Little Brother."

The "feature" of the showing was "An Empire Link," which traced a telephone call from Vancouver to Plymouth, England, over the Rockies to the "booster" station at Winnipeg, to Montreal and Drummondville, Que., across the radio waves to the beam receiving station at Baldock, Eng., from there to the central distributing house at London and on to Plymouth. The returning sound waves were shown following the land lines to Rugby, Eng., by beam wireless back to Canada where they were picked up at Yamachiche and relayed on land lines again to Vancouver, a total distance of more than 6,000 miles.

One of the most interesting points of this film was the method whereby the voices were "scrambledd" for the flight by radio and then "unscrambled" at the receiving station. This prevents listening in on the conversation by other receivers.

Blasting holes for poles out of solid rock and earth too tough for pick and shovel was filmed, as well as a new method being tested of ploughing lines underground for possible use on the prairies where farms are widely separated.

Ingenious devices used in research laboratories for testing equipment demonstrated the constant search for improved materials. Pliers used by linemen cut thousands of times through wire, linesmen's climbing irons tested until they break, telephone cords tangled, switchboard cords pulled and pulled, and the results carefully checked.

Intercommunication and ship-to-shore telephone service on the Cunard liner "Queen Mary" gave some idea of the mass of equipment necessary for the accommodation of the liner's 3,000 passengers and crew.

The "Flying Laboratory" was amazing in its description of flights made to test radio equipment, the two planes engaged in the service having a record of over 2500 testing flights.

Winding up the programme, "The Other Christmas Tree" gave the story of two trees, a spruce and a pine, how each realized its wish to be a Christmas tree, and how the pine, transformed to a telephone pole, found its hopes fulfilled by carrying the voice of a father to his waiting family on Christmas Eve as they watched the joyous scenes about the spruce which had become the Community Christmas tree.

The visiting Bell men were thanked by president P. S. Boyd, who stated the appreciation of the club members of the efforts the two men had made in getting to Chesterville through the snow-bound roads.

W. P. Markle reported on the combined meeting of representatives of Rotary district 171 and 172 at Brockville, Friday evening, when plans were made for fostering an international celebration of the 125 years of peace between the United States and Canada.

Trinity United Annual Meeting Shows Improved Standing

At the annual meeting of the congregation of Trinity United church on Thursday evening last in the church, it was with much satisfaction that it was learned the membership had reached a total of 327, and that the finances were in good shape all along the line. Rev. R. C. Tait presided as officers of the different branches of the church work reported for the year. John Helmer was elected to the session, and four new members, Messrs. Ward Johnston, Clifford Summers, Alfred Jarvis and Lawrence Doering were added to the board of stewards.

Messrs. Allison Graham, Jack Cross, Harry Allison and Jack Fulton were appointed ushers.

While the inclement weather kept the attendance at a smaller number than usual, a very pleasant social hour was spent, following the business, when the ladies of the congregation served refreshments.

Mr. and Mrs. George J. Hunt have returned to town after spending a month with their daughter in Toronto.

Mr. Eric Casselman was in Toronto last week-end on business in connection with the Manufactured Milk Producers' Association.

Mr. O. L. King returned to town at the week-end from spending a week at a convention of superintendents of Nestlé's Milk Products which took him to many points of the United States as the various plants were visited.
