HINTS & TIPS

How to make cycling easier for under 10¢

Lubricate it. That's right, just a little oil is usually all it takes. First though, clean your bike. Use some cleaning fluid to remove the stale oil and grease from around the front and rear hubs using an old 1½"to 2"cut down paint brush, also brush off the chain to remove the old grease and grime (best to remove the chain and dunk it in a can of HOME SOL) then let it dry. When you clean your bike thoroughly keep an eye open for any loose nuts and bolts and accessories and whenever there is a moving part such as brake levers, pedals, brake calibers etc., clean them off with some HOME SOL. Remember that when you use a HOME SOL fluid to clean, it will penetrate into parts you cannot see such as the hubs and pedals so lay the bike on its side to drain these parts and come back tomorrow. Best left in a warm environment to help evaporate the HOME SOL fluid. Now you can get out the oil can. Don't use a light sewing machine oil. Don't use a heavy oil or turpentine or anything with a varnish base. All you need for average bike is a #30 or 10W30 automotive oil. Use it on all the moving parts - you want it to go between any two moving metal parts. For the hubs it's best to be able to rotate the wheels and slowly apply oil to the area where the hub turns over its axle - do this on both sides - the crank axle also needs this treatment. At the same time especially if your bike is hanging or upside down and the chain is in place put oil on the chain while rotating it - you want the oil to penetrate in between the side plates and rollers and rivets use more than you think you need - let it penetrate and wipe off the surplus. The hubs are best if they are greased in which case once a year is sufficient - best to let your dealer do this if you're not the mechanically inclined type: however, the oil treatment is fine but do yourself a favour and feed the hubs some oil at least 3 more times during the season. The best way to oil all cables is to loosen the cable at the caliber on the far end then remove the cable from the lever - now take the cable to the handle bars so it sticks up vertically. Get some plasticine and make a small funnel around the top and tight to the cable - fill with oil and let it sit overnight. Presto! Next day put the cables back in place. If the cables are really stiff - best to replace them - if so why not give them the same oil funnel treatment before installing them - they'll work smoother and last longer. Oh yes - you should have some change out of the 10¢.
