Farmer Dies Following Seizure After Completing His Dinner

One of Group of Czechoslovakians Settled at Gallingertown, Was in Town Monday on Business.

Andrew Nemet, 55, of Gallingertown, a Czechoslovakian who came to Canada a couple of years ago, died shortly after suffering a seizure in the Dominion House as he finished his dinner on Monday. Crown Attorney J. G. Harkness, Cornwall, has decided an inquest is not necessary.

The funeral was held this morning from the family residence to Gallingertown United church at ten o'clock.

With a neighbour, John Frene, a fellow countryman, Nemet came to town Monday morning to deal horses and it is reported he had completed a trade with John Fader at the Dominion House. As the party finished dinner, Nemet excused himself and a short time later Matthew Flynn, son of the hotel proprietor, Thos. Flynn, found the man unconscious in the lavatory.

The man was removed to the open air and Dr. W. H. Lloyd summoned. Nemet failed to rally and died at 1.30 p.m. The body was taken to Dixon and MacPherson's undertaking parlours and the chief district coroner, Dr. T. Hamilton, of Brinston, was notified. The coroner called Constable Garnet McLean who notified Provincial Officer Frank Rose of Morrisburg. Dr. H. H. Casselman was instructed by the chief coroner to perform an autopsy and it was revealed that the Czechoslovakian had succumbed to a chronic heart and lung trouble.

Nemet was one of a number of families who came from Czechoslovakia to this section a couple of years ago and took over farms held by the government in the Gallingertown area and where they are reported to be prospering.

Besides his widow, Nemet is survived by two sons and two daughters at the new home, and a married daughter in the homeland.

Police stated that following the man's death, John Fader, local horseman with whom Nemet had made a deal, called off the transaction and handed over to Frene a sum of money he had received as "boot" and this, along with the dead man's wallet and papers were delivered to the widow.

Former Cornwall Flyer Dies Suddenly at Syracuse

"Jerry" Connell, 21 Years Old, Was Said By Conny Smythe to be One Of Hockey's Brightest Prospects.

Taken by death as his career was in the ascendant, Gerald (Jerry) Connell, young hockey and lacrosse player of Preston, Ont., rated by Conny Smythe as "one of the brightest prospects on the hockey horizon," was mourned in Canadian and American sports circles.

Connell, who was 21, died early on Wednesday after retiring in seemingly good health. Pending an autopsy, Dr. Daniel F. Luby expressed belief that death was caused by an embolism resulting from the fracture of a small bone in the leg which Connell suffered in a lacrosse game eight weeks ago.

Regarded as one of the finest lacrosse players in Eastern Canada, Connell played with Orillia Terriers this year. Two years ago he was a member of the Cornwall hockey team which competed in the Ottawa City League, the season the Flyers were coached by Bill League. He played on the rearguard along with Don Grant and Mike McMahon that season when the Flyers lost out to Hull Volants in the league finals.

Connell played a bang-up game for Syracuse Stars Tuesday night as they held Provindence Reds to a one-all tie in an International-American Hockey League game. It was a hard fought match and the young defence star was in the centre of several rough scrimmages. He was in high spirits and apparently in good health when he went to his hotel room.

Connell was found unconscious in bed by "Red" 'Heron, his roommate, and failed to respond to emergency treatment. Heron said that when he woke about 11 a.m. he noticed Connell was unusually pale. He shook him several times and, when he failed to rouse him, called Coach Eddie Powers, who summoned Dr. Luby. A call was put in for an ambulance and pulmotor and doctors worked over Connell for an hour before he was pronounced dead.

St. Andrew's W. M. Society Entertained by Mrs. G.Crump

The Women's Missionary Society of St. Andrew's church held its November meeting Wednesday afternoon last at the home of Mrs. Geo. Crump. The meeting opened with Apostles' Creed in unison and the opening Psalm 108 was sung.

The first scripture reading, Psalm 19, was taken by Mrs. Smirle and Mrs. McIntosh offered the Thanksgiving prayer. The minutes were read, and the roll call was answered by a verse of scripture containing only six words and taken from the Old Testament.

Mrs. Munro called the roll for the Welcome and Welfare department. The second scripture lesson was read alternately from Psalm 34 and Mrs. Lorne Marcellus took the Glad Tidings prayer. "Rescue the Perishing" was sung, and Mrs. J. A. Munro gave an excellent paper. The current events were taken from the first six months of the Glad Tidings, the W.M.S. Magazine.

In the business period, the secretaries reported for all departments, including the Mission Band leader and leader of the McKay-Douglas group. The treasurer, Mrs. Bailey, was unable to attend. The president welcomed a new member, Mrs. Jno. Fleming.

Mrs. Geo. Crawford gave a splendid Bible study paper, "The Bridge Builders," bringing out all along in the paper "Christ, the bridge." "All the Way My Saviour Leads Me" was the closing hymn and Miss Jamieson gave the final prayer.

Mrs. Crump served lunch, assisted by Mrs. Smirle and Mrs. Campbell. The thanks of the auxiliary were voiced by Mrs. Black and Mrs. Bigelow.

JUICY BUFFALO STEAKS.

CANADA'S buffalo experiment is a good example of the successful working out of commonsense methods of conservation.

That monarch of the western plains, the lordly bison, has been saved from extermination, and an annual surplus now is made available regularly to Canadians in the form of succulent buffalo steaks. Some idea of the size of the business is given by a recent announcement that this year 1,000,000 pounds of buffalo meat the dressed weight of the 2,000 or so animals slaughtered at Wainwright park this month, will be available for Canadian dinner tables.

To many, a good buffalo steak is an excellent dish, the meat being similar in texture to good beef and with much the same flavour. The whole of the one million pounds will not be "prime ribs and roasts" of course, but inferior portions and the carcasses of old and tough bison will be processed or sold to fur farmers and others who can make use of it.

HUGE PLANES FOR BRITAIN.

THREE major contracts, totalling forty-one aeroplanes are under way in Montreal aircraft plants for the Departfent of National Defense.

Nearly 600 men are engaged in the two plants involved, while more Canadian orders are awaited by these and other firms. Besides, most plants have reserved space for the manufacture of parts for the British Air Ministry's bombers, which is expected to start shortly.

More than four hundred men are employed at the east-end plant of Canadian Vickers, Limited in Montreal, on two large contracts. One is for ten giant Stranraer flying boats, and the other for thirteen Northrup Delta transports.

One of the Stranraer ships, the largest aeroplane ever built in Canada, has already been delivered. Weighing eight and a half tons and with a wingspread of 85 feet, the Stranraer is claimed to be superior to many of the latest foreign flying boats of either civil or military design. Some two dozen have already been completed in Great Britain.

THE MAN YOU CAN TRUST.

Stirling News-Argus.

THE MAN you can trust is the man who is simple, direct and sincere. When he under takes a responsible task, he is fully and deeply conscious of his responsibility. He is intent upon fairness and justice to all, even to those who oppose him.

To him, the insincerity of the demagogue is as dishonest as the trickery of the con man or the embezzler. To him, honour is dearer than power, and a clear conscience more precious than wealth or fame. He is suspicious of mere brilliance and he is not easily fascinated by the plausibility of quacks or misled by the enthusiasm of cranks, for good judgment, good character and ripe experience are what he most respects. He does not waver like a leaf in the winds of popular approval or disapproval. When he makes a pledge he can be relied upon to keep it, at whatever cost to himself, for he acts on principles of right and wrong, not on the convenience or expediency of the moment. He is not all things to all men. When he says yes, he means yes; and when he says no, means no.

In short, the man you can trust, in the long run, is not necessarily the clever man or the charming man, but the man who keeps his word.

INJURY TO SMALL TOWNS.

Alliston Herald.

IT may be good business for the railways but it injures the small towns of Ontario. We refer to the one cent a mile excursions which are run from the lesser centres of population to Toronto, says The Midland Free Press. The people of the towns are encouraged to go to the big city to do their shopping instead of spending their money in the places where they earn it. Particularly is this the case at the Christmas season. Thousands of dollars are taken out of communities that need it and spent in Toronto. We do not know that there is anything which can be done about it. Possibily, however, the December excursion might be eliminated, and thus give the merchants in the smaller towns a much needed break.

REARING VEAL CALVES.

Spring Veal Production May Not Be As Profi,table As in Other Years.—Butter Up, Beef is Dull.

VEAL production during the past few years has offered very fair returns in comparison with the price of butter fat. This year, there has been a marked advance in butter prices, while the beef market has remained dull. It is, therefore, only natural to expect that during this spring season, when calves are plentiful, the return on veal will not be as attractive as it was in the past.

The production of veal, however, still remains profitable during many months of the year. It provides an outlet for surplus dairy and beef calves that are vigourous and show signs of being good feeders. The market demands a calf weighing from 150 to 180 pounds. It requires in the neighbourhood of 650 pounds of milk to raise a calf to this stage. It can be roughly estimated, according to the present price of butter, that veal at six cents per pound would return to the farmer about the same price for the milk consumed, as if he had marketed his cream for the manufacture of butter. With veal at ten cents per pound, as was the case during the winter of 1938, it can readily be seen that veal offers very attractive returns at certain seasons of the year.

TUBERCULOSIS

This Dread Disease Costs Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Counties at Least $100,000 Annually; Claimed 41 Lives in 1936.

A Series of Special Articles by
GEORGE W. CRAGG, M.D.
Superintendent, St. Lawrence Sanatorium

ARTICLE 10.

IN THIS the tenth and last of the present series of articles, I wish to review briefly the articles which have preceded. By this means I hope to emphasize the main points, in order that they may more easily be remembered.

It must be remembered always that tuberculosis is a contagious disease and that a person must 'catch it" from someone else, or less frequently from drinking unpasteurized milk from tuberculous cows. The germs are spread mainly by a tuberculous individual coughing out the germs and these germs being breathed in by another person.

It must be remembered also that we cannot always rely on symptoms to tell us if a person is developing or has tuberculosis. Symptoms range all the way from none to severe, and the severity of symptoms does not necessarily correspond to the amount of activity of disease. A person with little trouble may be very ill, while a person with a great deal of trouble may feel perfectly well. The main symptoms which are found in tuberculosis are fever, loss of weight, loss of strength, loss of appetite, mild digestive upsets, night sweats, cough, sputum, blood spitting and pain in the chest. Less frequently we find erythema nodosum.

The importance of X-ray of the chest cannot be too strongly stressed. X-ray is by far the most useful means of diagnosis we have. Tuberculin testing in children and young adults is also important and is harmless.

It is very important to recognize that the earlier treatment is started, the more speedily will recovery take place and the more satisfactory will be the result. It must be understood that REST in bed is paramount, and once tuberculosis is diagnosed, that person should go to bed AT ONCE. A sanatorium is the proper place to treat tuberculosis, but if a bed is not available, the patient should go to bed at home and remain there until sanatorium accommodation is available. Under no consideration should a person resort to nostrums and quackery as these usually lead to a fatal outcome. The ultimate result depends a great deal on the patient himself and his ability to adapt himself to a prolonged period of inactivity. Any special treatments, such as pneumothorax or surgical operations, should only be done by those who have had long experience in this type of work.

In tuberculosis an ounce of prevention is worth many pounds of cure. Strict isolation of infective cases and their removal from other members of the family is the primary and most important feature of prevention. Then follows early diagnosis of other cases by examination of contacts, school children and factory workers, in the order of best results and economy. Personal hygiene in keeping physically fit by moderate open air exercise, adequate and balanced diet and avoidance of fatigue, is within the scope of everyone. A healthy person has a better chance of avoiding tuberculosis than one whose health is undermined by improper living. Periodic examinations, including X-ray of the chest, will in the end pay dividends out of all proportion to the initial cost.

If these essentials in the spread, treatment and prevention of tuberculosis are properly and efficiently carried out, we then can look forward to that Utopia of a tuberculosis-free country.

CLAIM HORSE DIED OF FRIGHT AFTER SEEING BEAR ON ROAD

Milton.—The sight of a bear, met on the road, caused one of his team of horses to die of fright, Robt. Wedge claims. He was drawing wood from the countryside near the sixth line of Nassagaweya, when his team became panic-stricken. Wedge says he then noticed a large bear in the road. After bringing the team under control, he drove home and put them in the stable. The next morning one of his horses had died. He attributed the death to the fright the horse got the day before.

SCOUT TRAINING SAVES LIFE.

The daily papers told a few days ago of a boy who was lost two days in the woods and who owes his life to Boy Scout training. It enabled him to light a fire with a revolver bullet when his matches got wet, to identify edible berries and to make wintergreen tea in an old tin can. He ate the pulp. And yet there are those who would have us believe that Boy Scout training tends to militarism.

Captain "Fernan" Cameron Dies After Cruel Assault

Resident of Cameron's Island, 18 Miles East of Cornwall, Was Known in Chesterville.—Assailant is Held.

Captain Fernandez James Cameron, 60-year-old resident of Cameron's Island in the St. Lawrence river, 18 miles east of Cornwall, died in Hotel Dieu hospital, Cornwall, at 5.45 p.m. Monday, from injuries reported to have been inflicted by a heavy wooden stick.

Captain Cameron, a former officer in the 154th Battalion, C.E.F., was attacked in his island home while he was preparing breakfast shortly after eight o'clock Monday morning.

Relative Held at Border.

At 10.30 p.m., Dan McDonald, 48, of Bucklin, Kansas, for whom a warrant charging murder had been issued at Alexandria, Ont., was apprehended by Immigration officers at Fort Covington, N.Y., 15 miles east of Cornwall, who had received a radio notification from Ogdensburg, N.Y. McDonald had walked through the customs and was in the village when Immigration Officer Francis A. Thompson apprehended him. He did not know the police were looking for him, it was reported.

McDonald is said to be a distant relative of Captain Cameron.

McDonald was reported to have been living with Cameron for the past year. Other residents of the house were two brothers, Stanley and Leander Cameron, and a sister, Miss Levinia Cameron.

Argue Over Motor Boat.

It was reported Cameron's sister, who is about 70 years of age, was in the kitchen when he was attacked. The two brothers were out in the barn. His assailant walked in and engaged in a conversation regarding a motor-boat and an argument ensued.

It is alleged Cameron refused a request to repair the motor boat. His attacker walked outside the door, picked up a stick, fashioned as a hoe handle, and struck Cameron several times, according to information.

The man then left the island, according to police, and it is believed he rowed his boat to the south bank of the St. Lawrence river, landing in Quebec territory. The island is about opposite Lancaster on the Ontario mainland.

Cameron recovered consciousness shortly after the attack and it was not believed he was seriously injured until noon, when he lapsed into unconsciousness. One of the brothers rowed to the mainland three-quarters of a mile distant and brought the family physician, Dr. T. O. McLaren, of Lancaster. Dr. McLaren dressed the wounds and ordered Captain Cameron removed to the Cornwall hospital where he died an hour after being admitted.

A post mortem examination was made by Dr. W. A. Milligan, Cornwal,l who reported death was due to a fractured skull.

Centralized Service Needed To Halt Tuberculosis Spread

Dr. George W. Cragg, Superintendent St. Lawrence Sanatorium Urges Plan Before Rotary Here.

Erection of the St. Lawrence Sanatorium for battling tuberculosis is a credit to the officials of the United Counties for their recognition of the menace and instituting their energetic programme, but the spread of the dread disease cannot be checked by that institution ,but only by continued cooperation with the health clinics thoughout the counties, Dr. George W. Cragg, superintendent of the new institution serving Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry, told the Chesterville Rotary Club on Tuesday evening, and urged the founding of a centralized service financed by the counties.

Dr. Cragg earnestly stressed the early treatment of tuberculosis, stating that already 34 out of 164 patients have been discharged from the sanatorium with their disease arrested. Tubercular symptoms are very treacherous and often do not arouse suspicion until the case has become serious and it is perhaps too late to help the patient.

Early discovery of infected persons yields 95 per cent or more cures after about six months or a year of sanatorium treatment, while those in moderately advanced stages require two to three years and then often find it difficult to earn their own livelihood and retain their health. The far advanced group of sufferers require 3 to 5 years and if they recover their bodies are so worn that they are unable to earn a living.

The changes in the Ontario Sanatoria Act were explained by Dr. Cragg. Cost of treatment of indigent patients was removed from the counties and taken on by the Provincial Government, but cost of treatment after the discharge or transportation or burial expenses are to be paid by the municipality, with the exception of pneumo-thorax treatments, on which the Government pays up to three dollars for each treatment which must be administered by an authorized physician. The patients are expected to pay as much of the cost as they can, but few are able to pay for the lengthy periods required for a successful treatment of tuberculosis.

At the extension clinics, those suspected of being infected are given the tuberculin test, and positive reactors are given X-ray examination. The X-ray is the surest method of diagnosing a case, said Dr. Cragg. Many who react to the tuberculin test do not develop the disease but the germs are in their systems.

It is the hope of the sanatorium officers to extend the clinic to include Chesterville, Avonmore and Iroquois, along with Cornwall, Morrisburg, Winchester, Finch and Alexandria, which are now included in the survey. This is paid for by the sale of Christmas seals, but the financing is difficult. Dr. Cragg believed the cost of a centralized clinic in charge of a qualified nurse could be financed for $4,000 and would be a big improvement over the present method in that follow-up work could be done on discharged patients.

The death rate of 22 out of 164 cases in the St. Lawrence Sanatorium was very low, declared the speaker, as the average number of sanatorium deaths is 25 per cent, and also is it favourable in view of the fact that with the opening of the institution it could be expected many of the cases admitted would be of the advanced type.

The clinics have located 76 active cases of tuberculosis in the counties for which there are no beds available at the present time and it was imperative that they be separated from their families as the greatest spread of tuberculosis is through such cases.

President P. S. Boyd thanked Dr. Cragg for his address, telling the speaker that the rapt attention of the Rotarians was evidence the speech was one of the most educative heard at the local club.

Dr. W. H. Lloyd and Dr. A. B. Clayton were guests of the club along with Alf. Jarvis and Stanley David. Dr. H. H. Casselman introduced Dr. Cragg.

Attention was again called to the Maxville charter night, Monday, Nov. 28, and in order to have the club represented 100 per cent, next week's luncheon has been cancelled by the local Rotarians.

USING HIS IMAGINATION.

The press agent of the Thousand Islands Bridge Authority is letting his imagination run riot when he says that the new scenic highway running parallel to the St. Lawrence between Brockville and Gananoque is being rushed to completion so that it may be ready for the King and Queen to travel over when they greet President and Mrs. Roosevelt at the bridge next summer.

In the first place, the road is not, unfortunately, being "rushed to completion." On the contrary, operations upon it have been suspended for the winter season. In the second place, there is no official intimation whatever that the King and Queen intend to include this part of the Dominion in their tour.

And, finally, there is little beyond irresponsible rumour to furnish background for the belief that Their Majesties will be greeted by the President and his wife at the international bridge next summer. The probability is that Their Majesties will travel to Washington by rail.

"HAM AND EGGS" CONTINUED.

The recent campaign in California in favour of the State paying out $30 each Thursday to every citizen over 50 years old, was vigourous and extravagant, but when it ended there was a half million dollar fund unexpended. So potent was the lure of $30 every week without any service in return that the nickels and dimes and even larger amounts from the gullible poured into the promoters' hands like a flood. The latter received far more than they could spend in a limited period on advertising, rallies, picnics and what not even though they allowed themselves generous remuneration for their service.

Slight Earthquake Shock Felt Throughout District

Seismologists Say About 50 Shocks Occur in This Region Each Year And Recorded by Stations.

Earthquake wobblings that created mild consternation in Chesterville at 5.19 p.m., on Friday, and also were felt in Winchester and Morrisburg, were termed "quite insignificant" by Dr. E. A. Hodgson, Dominion astronomer.

The shock was described by many as a heavy rumbling which grew loud and then diminished, with windows and dishes rattling when the shock was at its height. No damage was reported here or elsewhere.

Earthquakes happen two or three times a month around these parts, but most of the time the man in the street never notices them, Dr. Hodgson has explained.

Seismologists — the people who study earthquakes — have discovered only recently that there are as many as 40 or 50 quakes every year in this section of the continent.

"We have known in a general way for the last 20 years that there have been small earthquakes from time to time in Eastern Canada and New England, but had not realized there are so many," said Dr. Hodgson.

The throwing of further light and accuracy on earthquake recordings has been made possible by the creation four or five years ago of the Northeastern Seismological Association. Through the organization of this association, data on each earthquake are now recorded at Ottawa. Shawinigan Falls, Que., and Seven Falls, near Beaupre, Que., and also in eight towns of the United States. The different points then "pool their resources," and are able thus to discover with a high decree of accuracy the location or epicentre of the earthquake.

As reports have not been received from the other Stations, Dr. Hodgson was able only to state that Friday's earthquake was somewhere around a radius of 100 miles from here. He could not state precisely the direction.

A CRUEL PRANK.

Provincial Officer W. Franks, of Brockville, is investigating a cruel Hallowe'en joke in the vicinity of Toledo when a blind horse was conveyed to an upstairs room of a deserted house and tethered there where it remained for three days without food or water. The horse was removed from the stables of James Shea on Hallowe'en and the pranksters led the blind animal to the vacant house nearby. Hearing a noise in the house, James McLinton investigated and found the horse. The building was damaged to a considerable extent.—Carleton Place Canadian.

HUGE LAKE LIES BENEATH DUSTY SECTION OF KANSAS

Western Kansas counties may be dry on the surface and included in the dust bowl, but only a few feet underground is enough water to float a fleet of battleships ,according to M. H. Davidson, an engineer for the State Department of Agriculture.

The huge underground lake is from 10 to 100 feet below the surface, Davidson said, and the water could be pumped up profitably for the irrigation of feed crops that could be used for fattening cattle. However, the cost of lifting the water would make it impossible to irrigate wheat profitably, he said.

In addition to the untouched underground water, Davidson said, enough has been impounded in the state in the past four years through the building of lakes to water 75,000 head of cattle for 150 years.

6,000 Freak Fatalities Occur Last 12 Months in Canada

Accidents Take Twice as Many Men As Women, Statistics Show.—400 Die Under Four Years of Age.

Ottawa.—You may die in bed or by falling out of bed, in the bath tub, or by stepping out of the bath tub. An insect might bite you, or you might swallow gopher poison or gasoline—or lye. Or you might take the wrong medicine.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics has recorded 6,000 strange deaths in the past twelve month—deaths by accident to young and old alike, in the cities and on the farms.

And men are more likely to get killed than women, for two-thirds of the accidental deaths occur to men.

Automobiles take their toll, but there are many strange means of accidental death. The Dominion Bureau reports that one young girl set her comb down on the stove after combing her hair, and died in the fire that followed. A youngster played with a cigarette lighter and his clothes caught fire, taking his life. Another, heeding his mother's call to the dinner table, slid down the bannister, to death.

Four hundred youngsters under four years of age died by accident—they fell into boiling tubs of water, or into wells; or they were fed external medicine or tumbled into open fireplaces. Some died when they fell from trees or swings in the play-yards. Others fell onto the sharp edge of a plough, or saw, and others fell into the river.

Explosions claimed the lives of some men. Others were shot by their companions while hunting. Runaway horses killed others. Some fell through river ice in mid-winter, and others fell from high buildings while cleaning windows.

MORE SCOUT TOURNIQUET FIRST AID

Two additional cases have been added to the unusual number of instances this year in which Boy Scouts have improvised a tourniquet to control serious loss of blood following accidents. When a Windsor, Ont., boy playing corner lot football fell on a jagged piece of milk bottle and suffered a deep nine-inch cut in his calf, Scout Alan Wilkinson propmtly applied a handkerchief tourniquet, and possibly saved the victim's life. In the second case, Scout Harold Garside of Hespeler, Ont., out hunting, was accidentally shot in the leg by a companion with a shotgun. The Scout himself applied the tourniquet, with the help of his companion.

KNOWLEDGE OF JUDGING GOOD FOR DAIRY FARMER.

Fine Points of Good Dairy Cow Explained for Farmer Wishing Conformity And Production.

NEARLY all farmers have some interest in live stock, and the man who is desirous of maintaining uniformity in his herd should have a practical knowledge of live stock judging and breed type. It is often true that a good producing cow may not be very pleasing from a type standpoint, yet it is also a fact that production and true dairy type are a combination that should be sought after and maintained in farm herds. This will not only increase the owner's interest in the herd, but will be a distinct advantage when individuals are offered for sale. Being able to select animals that will be economical producers and also conform to the desired breed type will be a decided asset to the stock farmer.

Four major points should be kept in mind in judging dairy cattle. First, the mammary system, which is the udder, the milk veins and the milk wells; these together rate from 30 to 35 points out of a total of 100. When in full milk a good udder will be large extending well forward and far up behind and firmly attached to the body. Its quarters should be even with very little separation between them. and the bottom nearly level. When milked out the udder should be much reduced in size, pliable, and the skin loose and soft. Always look out for defects, such as lumps in the udder. which are an indication of mastitis. The size and shape of the teats is very important from the standpoint of disease and convenience in milking. Mammary veins and milk wells should be well distributed and pronounced in the mature cow.

The second point is dairy temperament. This is a quality that indicates ability to convert food into milk. Cows of the dairy breeds should lack a beefy appearance, the bones being fairly prominent and not heavily fleshed. Size of udder is also considered. Extreme thinnes because of lack of feed, or fleshing before calving. should not be confused with dairy temperament.

The third point to consider is body capacity and size. All other things being equal the larger cow is preferred. and all breeds have a standard of weight. As it takes feed to produce milk, the cow must have capacity for feed. this will mean a well-sprung rear rib, a fairly long and deep body. good heart and lung capacity and deep broad chest.

The fourth point to consider is health and vigour. This should be apparent in all breeding animals; to stand the strain of bearing young and producing a profitable milk yield the animal must have a good constitution.

The summary of these points is, that the cow to be a profitable producer, must have health, vigour, soundness, superior dairy temperament, large feed capacity, good heart, lungs and circulatory system, and a well-developed mammary system.

If pure breds are under consideration, a knowledge of breed type is needed. Although the points for a good cow hold true in all breeds, breed type must be kept in mind when judging a pure bred or a grade of a particular breed. Good type and high production must be combined.

A Young Girl's Fight Against Overwheming Odds—Illness and Poverty

JUST keep her quiet, Angie, and feed her up," said fat little Dr. Burns, reaching up to pat the tall girl on her yellow head.

"Yes, but, doctor," Angela began, hesitating over what she wanted to say next. Her colour deepened until it spread from her firm, tanned throat to the soft curls on her forehead. "Aunt Kate ought to—I mean, won't she get well without all those things to eat—and the tonics?"

Dr. Burns turned abruptly and, putting two pudgy fingers under Angela's chin, brought the rosy face and the troubled brown eyes around to meet his searching gaze. "Angela, is there any hitch about ready money?"

"No, no; we can manage, Dr. Burns," she said a little breathlessly. "I just wanted to be sure that they were necessary to—to her recovery, you know. It's all right."

"You're, sure, my dear? You'd come to me, the oldest friend Miss Kate and you have, wouldn't you? Friends can share with one another, you know. Come now, Angie, we're all liable to be in need of money at times, and Miss Kate's not been about and keeping an eye on bills and things for a while: so maybe—"

Angela shook her head firmly, but her eyes smiled at him through a quick mist of tears. "If it's ever necessary for Aunt Kate's comfort and for her recovery," she said softly, "I promise to go to you. But we can manage." The mouth took a gently obstinate line, and she repeated more firmly, "We can manage. Thank you a thousand times for the thought."

After he had gone Angela sat down on the low front step and meditatively rested her chin on her tightly clasped hands. She was not quite ready to go to Aunt Kate and answer the questions she knew she would ask.

With her aches and pains Aunt Kate had enough to worry her: she had always been an active woman and now to have to be still on her back day after day was almost torture. She would say at once that there was no money for falderal luxuries. That is what she would certainly call the doctor's prescription. With a heavy sigh Angela admitted that, whether they were luxuries or necessaries, there was no extra money with which to buy them.

"But she's got to have them!" the girl said aloud in a fierce little voice and pounded her clinched hand hard on her knee. "And she's not going to be bothered either, trying to think out a way. I'm sixteen, almost, and that's old enough to be earning some money. If I only knew how to start!"

Staring absently out over a grove of orange trees that bloomed across the road, she sat a while longer without moving. The hot Florida sun beat down, turning the air to a blinding shimmer of gold, and a warm little breeze blew the loose sand of the road into tiny eddies.

Angela drew a long breath. "If a thing has to be done," she said slowly, "I guess the first step is to make up your mind it's going to be done and then set about finding a way. I can't study stenography or filing or even dressmaking the way girls in stories do when they need to earn money; this is a rush order, and time's the most important part of it. Let's see what my assets are." She laughed wistfully and held up five slim, brown fingers, ready to check off the items in a businesslike manner.

"I'm a good plain cook, but that won't help, for I couldn't leave Aunt Kate alone. So number one's crossed off. I could bake cakes and pies to order, but everyone around here does her own baking. O dear—no; wait!" she commanded herself in a different tone as if she had quite expected her feet or her hands or perhaps her busy little head to run away without warning.

"I've read of people's making homemade candy and shipping it to some city store to be sold.' 'Her eyes were beginning to glow. "There's that candied peel of mine the minister's wife was so wild about last winter. That's more of a novelty than ordinary fudge and creams. And I've always cut my rind into cunning shapes before candying it. It would sell; I know it would, sure as can be!"

She fell to checking off items again, now with vivid, pink-cheeked enthusiasm. "Candied orange peel in heart shapes and four-leaf clovers and in wee wedding-bells and candied rose leaves—they're best of all to my taste and lots the prettiest to look at—and some strips of lemon rind for a nice tart flavour. And, oh, I do believe I have the idea after all! Only where to sell them—"

Then her face brightened again. "Why, of course! Aunt Kate used to sell homemade preserves years ago to Decker & Johnson up in Baltimore. I was little then, but I've heard her say lots of times since she was sorry she wasn't strong enough to keep it up; so it must have paid. I can put up a sample box and send it to them with a letter asking if they'd like to give me an order."

She became aware now of Aunt Kate's thin, anxious voice, "Ange-la-a, Angie, aren't you coming up?"

"Right away," Angela called back cheerfully.

Now that she saw action ahead the whole world looked different to her. It was the awful sense of helplessness that had oppressed her.

"What did the doctor say about my case?" Aunt Kate demanded as Angela entered the room. "He made light of it to me. What'd he say to you?"

"Oh, you're going to get well and strong, auntie," Angela assured her earnestly. "But you've got to be patient, dear. And just for a few days —" With a careful hand she smoothed the blankets to avoid looking at her. "Just for a while we've got to be a little extravagant and have junkets and beef juice and things like that?"

"Who's going to pay for 'em?" Aunt Kate asked dryly, restlessly flinging herself back on the pillows.

"Just for a week, auntie," Angela soothed, patting away hard at a corner of the blankets.

The sick woman shut her eyes impatiently, and Angela tiptoed out of the room. She could keep Aunt Kate from rebelling perhaps for a week, or at most for a few days longer than that; but the doctor had said weeks, perhaps months. It was all a matter of building up the patient's depleted vitality, he had told her, and nothing except rest, nourishing food and freedom from worry could accomplish the task.

"Well, I'm in for it now," she said, buttoning herself into a big checked apron. "And there's no time to begin like right away. Thank goodness, I live in Florida, and that Mr. Dusey lets me have all the windfall oranges I care to pick up."

Five minutes later the hot little kitchen was in full swing of preparations for the new business venture. Angela ran about on light feet, humming under her breath as she mixed and cut and boiled. Everything went without a hitch. The knife blade cut enchanting fancy shapes from the golden rind, and the sugar neither burned nor spilled on the stove lids.

Without any waste of time Angela even discovered a tin biscuit box that was exactly the right size to pack the finished product into. Altogether it seemed that the fates were with her.

She wrote the business letter. First she composed it with the help of pad and pencil and with much anxious wrinkling of brows; then she copied it on the best sheet of heavy letter paper that she could find on Aunt Kate's desk.

She posted it that evening and shipped by parcel post the tin box of fragrant candied rind.

There was a great light of relief and satisfaction in Angela's brown eyes as she walked slowly home from the post office. She had started boldly up her hill of difficulty. She counted the days before she could hear from Baltimore and decided that in seven or eight days she should surely have a reply.

It was a hard week to get through without betraying her anxiety to her Aunt Kate's watchful eyes, but somehow the time passed — not only a week, but eight days, nine, ten. On the tenth day Aunt Kate rebelled against the expensive meals and insisted on going back to the old economical ways. To avoid a scene Angela gave in ,especially since her patient did seem better; but she promised herself that, if the order she was daily hoping and praying for came, there would be no further yielding to Aunt Kate.

While she waited she thought a good deal about little additions to her original plan—novel ways of packing the candied peel, new fruits to be tried. The next day at the village five-and-ten-cent store she discovered a pretty woven basket that she could stain a delicate green and use for packing the peel. She was enthusiastic over it all, and the only cloud across the blue of her sky was the delay in hearing from Decker & Johnson. Still, eleven days were not many, she assured herself; it was a long way from Florida to Maryland and back. Then on the eleventh day came the reply.

It was neither favourable nor unfavourable. They had her note, Decker & Johnson wrote courteously, and had looked for the sample goods she said she was shipping. They remembered their former dealings with Miss Katharine Hastings and regretted that the mutually profitable business relations between them had terminated. So far, however, Miss Angela Hastings' package had not reached them, and it therefore seemed probable that it had gone astray in transit.

Smarting tears rushed to Angela's eyes and brimmed over despairingly on her cheeks. She had not started up the hill of difficulty after all, it seemed, but was still back at the bottom. After her hard work and those days of happy hoping and waiting, the disappointment was too much.

At that point all the fighting blood in Angela Hastings showed itself. She suddenly lifted her head to a determined angle, and a flash of determination shone in her wet brown eyes.

"They'll get the second shipment!" she said between set teeth. "And I'll pack it in the new way. Just you wait and see, Mr. Decker-and-Johnson up in Baltimore. I'm almost glad you didn't get the first, because the second batch will be much—oh, one hundred times—more attractive than the one that got lost."

Indeed it was. No one who saw those six green-stained little baskets filled with the spicy golden peel and the candied pinkness of rose petals would ever have contradicted her. The baskets were packed to look like miniature steamer baskets of fresh fruit and were lined with frilled white paper and tied with jaunty green bows. The most dyspeptic old gentleman with a horror of candy shops could not have passed by one of those baskets of Angela's. And this time she packed them into a big square tin box and shipped them by parcel post, insured. Then she settled down to another period of waiting.

The second letter came promptly in the morning mail on the seventh day. With the opening of the envelope a cheque fell out and slid to the floor at Angela's feet. With suddenly shaking fingers she picked it up. It was made out to Angela Hastings for the sum of five dollars.

Decker & Johnson were offering her ten dollars a dozen for the baskets and would take as many as she could produce. They urged speed in shipping the peel, for the first consignment had been unusually popular.

Aunt Kate heard a great scrambling of excited feet up the uncarpeted stairs; it reminded her of Angela's little-girl feet tumbling up those same stairs to her on special occasions.

Angela's happy, breathless voice travelled ahead of her flying footsteps. "Aunt Kate, Aunt Kate!" she with a break of tears and of laughter between the words. "The most wonderful thing has just this minute happened—I can't seem to get up quick enough—the most wonderful thing—"

Pedro, The Buckayro

A Fall — His Horse Gone — A Mad Bull Lunging at Him!

PEDRO LAGUNA rubbed his eyes and twisted over in his bunk to look at his watch. It was a quarter after four. Tossing back his blanket, he bounded to the floor and began rapidly to pull on his high-heeled boots and the second pair of stiff overalls that most of the buckayros used in hot weather in place of "chaps." Then he darted out of the bunkhouse door and across the yard to the whitewashed shed. Slipping the bridle on his horse and then throwing on the saddle, he led the animal through the gate. Within five minutes of the time when he had first awakened he was loping up the three-hundred-acre horse pasture.

Mindful of the foreman's sharp admonition, Pedro circled quickly round through the several arroyos until he was sure that he had routed out every horse in the remuda. With necks arched and their manes flying, the seventy splendid animals, many of them registered stock, trotted away in a broken band down the field before him. When Pedro had driven the last horse into the corral and had slammed the heavy barred gate shut upon them, he turned his own mount loose and hurried back to the bunk house.

The men were already at breakfast. Pedro dipped hastily into the wash basin, slicked down his hair, tied the bright crimson silk handkerchief that Sing, the Chinese cook, had presented to him, around his neck, and stepped over the bench into his own place at table.

Pedro's heart was singing, but he tried not to let the men see how happy he was. He had been born on the ranch, and the day before, on his sixteenth birthday, they had made him a buckayro. In spite of the good-natured banter of the men, Pedro knew that he could ride with the best of them and do the work, too. He had no thought of delaying things on this his first day on full duty. Before he had half satisfied his hunger the men began to get up, one by one, and to go out to the corral with their tie ropes. Taking a last hasty mouthful of pancake, Pedro joined them.

By five o'clock the ten buckayros were all in the saddle, and their mounts, as they started away, were prancing and caracoling to the champ of the notch rattles in the spade bits. The men had a long day of work before them—to round up several hundred head of mixed stock that had been driven down from the small mountain ranches to the open range to the north.

For a mile or two the men rode along together, joking and chatting. The still invisible sun touched the distant snowcapped range to their left with a delicate rose colour that spread and deepened until the great blinding disc burst into slight. A little later a cluster of cattle appeared in the distance. Three of the men put spurs to their horses. Others turned off on either side. The "rodeo" was on.

"You keep with me!" Fred Homer, the boss buckayro, called to Pedro.

The two made for a stretch of cover where the salt brush and chico grew shoulder-high. As they worked slowly through it, they here and there started or turned a steer or a cow with a calf. Twice they passed the horned skulls and bleached white bones of cattle that had long before wandered into the bush to die.

When they had reached the other side of the brush the two buckayros drove the cattle at a run toward the holding-ground. Off to the north, almost on the horizon, it seemed, other ant-like bunches were scurrying in.

"Now," said Homer, as he checked his horse and reined in beside Pedro, "we'll get that stock on the other side of the canal. Fidel Ortez, the fence rider on this section, reported a bad bull among them.

A half hour's easy lope brought them to the canal. Crossing their stirrup leathers over their saddles, Homer and Pedro knelt on the horses' backs while the animals waded, shoulder deep, across the stream.

The cattle that they were after were grazing along the bank. A hundreds yards down the canal a big dun bull, with lifted head, stood motionless and sullenly watched them.

Pedro turned up the canal and Homer worked downward. Both of them were soon busily occupied, for they had to do some sharp riding in order to force the cattle to take to the water.

A bunch of half a dozen steers, pressed by the boss buckayro, broke into a run down the bank. By making a short dash, however, Homer headed them off. One of the steers turned abruptly and floundered out into the canal, and Homer quickly pulled in his mount, for he knew that the other steers were sure to follow the first.

This manœuvre brought Homer close to the bull. Before horse or the rider had time to notice him, the ugly brute had lowered his powerful head and charged. He struck the horse squarely and ripped a deep gash in its chest. With the thrust went a mighty heave upward. Straight into the air rose the agonized horse until it tumbled over backward.

For once the unprepared buckayro was not quick enough to swing free from trouble. The saddle horse caught him in the side. Homer felt and heard his ribs snap. A sudden sick faintness swept over him and, half stunned by the throw, he lay stretched on the ground just where he had landed.

Pedro saw the attack from farther up the canal. With a startled shout he jabbed home the fine, hinged sliver spurs, with tiny bells dangling from them, that had been father's. The blooded animal fairly bounded beneath them at their sharp prick. At full gallop they dashed down along the canal bank.

The wounded horse, meanwhile, had scrambled to its feet and plunged into the water just in time to escape a second onslaught from the bull. With eyes wildly rolling, it made its way to the farther side and staggered out.

The bull thereupon turned his attention to the stricken rider. For the moment, Homer was incapable of any action. With blazing eyes the bull watched him, while one hoof restlessly pawed the earth. The slightest movement on Homer's part would be enough to bring the creature on.

"Ah-a-a-a, up, up ,up!" yelled Pedro in a wild cattle cry as he came rushing on. Pedro had witnessed more than one bullfight and he knew something of the technique. He ould save his companero, of course. His blood raced at the prospect of such a combat; it was a chance to prove his standing with the men.

As he rode, he unloosened with his right hand the crimson scarf about his neck. At just the right instant he pulled his horse to its haunches and, leaning out from the saddle, flicked the bull across the eyes with the flaring scarf.

Forgetting instantly his first enemy, the bull turned, raging, to avenge this new insult. The horse that Pedro was riding and the hand that guided it, however, were too quick for the beast. As the horse pivoted out of the way, Pedro heard a call from the foreman. Homer had regained consciousness, and was struggling to get up.

"Lie quiet, senor, until I take care of the bull!" shouted Pedro; and with a suggestion of the easy poise and bravado of the real bullfighter, he waved reassuringly to the foreman.

During the next few minutes there was plenty of excitement. Skillfully stirring the bull to mad fury with the crimson scarf, Pedro enticed him to a safe distance from where Homer lay.

"Now for a fancy job!" Pedro muttered.

Thrusting the scarf into his shirt, he unstrapped the reata on the bow of his saddle. Hitherto Pedro had done most of his roping surreptitiously. Quickly he ran the coils of woven rawhide through his fingers. The reata was supple and flawless— strong enough, almost, to stop a train. It had cost Pedro a dollar and a half the running foot — the savings of many months.

Pedro and his mount and the bull were now within a few feet of the east-line fence, which ran about fifty yards from the canal. At that point the bull, by no means discouraged by his previous futile rushes, whirled at close quarters and lunged more viciously than ever. As Pedro's attention was divided, the horse escaped the sweep of the threatening horns by only inches. Its haunches banked into a post of the fence. The rebound crossed its legs, and, with startling suddenness, horse and rider came tumbling to the ground.

In a second both were on their feet, unharmed by the fall, but the aspect of the battle had changed. The horse bolted, and Pedro was left to face the enemy afoot. The rôle of matador was not exactly the part he had planned to play. The confident grin that he had worn froze on his face.

Already the big bull was almost upon him. One prod of those sharp horns and Pedro was done for. With a wild choking yell, the boy bounded sidewise for his life. The bull's nearer horn caught and pierced his overalls at the hip and scored deeply over his skin. The cloth yielded with a ripping sound, and the boy staggered as the bull's straining body brushed past him. The upflung gravel pattered on his boots; the flying hoofs almost trampled him.

Swish! With the inspired action that comes to the quick-witted in a pinch, Pedro snapped the reata to which he had clung. At that distance it would have been hard to miss; the nose caught the leg that was his mark.

A second time Pedro jumped. At the same time he deftly took a hitch around the top of the fence post. A picture of Three-Fingered Rosario's hand, mutilated by a burning rope, flashed through his mind, but, pluckily, he held to the free end of the reata.

Crash! The short slack was taken up. The bull flopped in a heap, and under the pull the fence post gave till the barbed-wire strands took up the strain. The bull's rampage for that day was ended.

Slowly the blood surged back into Pedro's dusky cheeks. With his breath still coming and going rapidly, and with signs of his grins returning, he proceeded to make fast the reata.

"Now, senor," said Pedro, when he had caught his mount and had managed to get Homer across the canal again. "I'll take the saddle and bridle off your horse, here. The gash isn't bleeding much, and he'll make his own way to the ranch in a few hours. Then, as soon as I can get in myself, I'll send them out with the buckboard for you."

"All right," answered the buckayro foreman, "but I can wait a little extra spell. Get back to the men first. Rosario has always acted as segundo; tell him to take charge of the work. And, Pedro," Homer added as he shook the boy's hand, "I don't need to add that you've made good right at the start."

AN APT SIMILE.

Another American team has defeated a British team at bridge. The general impression seems to be that London bridge is falling down.

But An Imitation.

She (as he placed the ring on her finger): "I hope this isn't a cheap imitation."

He: 'No, my dear; it's the most expensive one I could find."
